On June 16, 1937:

S. 329. An act to further extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead and desert-land entrymen; and

S. 470. An act for the relief of Joseph M. Cacace, Charles M. Cacace, and Mary E. Clibourne.

On June 17, 1937:

S. 609. An act for the relief of Edith Lewis White.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE: EMERGENCY FUND FOR FLOOD CONTROL ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER TRIBUTARIES (S. DOC. NO. 83)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year 1938, under the War Department, for "Emergency fund for flood control on tributaries of the Mississippi River", amounting to $200,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

DRAFTS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION BY THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate letters from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting drafts of proposed legislation, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to committees, as follows:

A letter, together with a draft of legislation proposing to amend section 2 of the act to incorporate "The Howard University"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A letter, together with a draft of legislation proposing to authorize the use of certain facilities of national parks and national monuments for elementary-school purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to pass bill H. R. 5538, relating to blind pensions, now pending before the Congress of the United States

Whereas the depression and the present oversupply of labor have affected severely the opportunity of blind persons to compete for jobs; and

Whereas a bill known as H. R. 5538 is now pending before the Congress of the United States which aims to remedy in a measure the present economic handicaps of the blind: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to pass the bill known as H. R. 5538, introduced by Congressman MATTHEW H. DUNN, of Pennsylvania; and be it further

Resolved, That duly attested copies of this resolution be sent to Congressman DUNN, to the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives, to both Houses of Congress, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Olin Lee Barber, Oberlin, Ohio, praying that steps be taken to stop the present labor troubles and resulting violence in the State of Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Clerical and Professional Projects Association and Workers Alliance, San Francisco, Calif., praying for the making of an appropriation of $3,000,000,000 for the W. P. A. during the next fiscal year, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MOORE presented a resolution adopted by the forty-third annual convention of the New Jersey State Federation of Women's Clubs at Atlantic City, N. J., protesting against the enactment of pending legislation pertaining to the reorganization of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented petitions, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of New York City and vicinity, praying for the enactment of pending legislation known as the Ellenbogen textile bill, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Negro Labor Assembly, of New York City, favoring the enactment of the so-called Wagner-Van Nuys antilynching bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RETIREMENT PLANS FOR INDUSTRIAL WORKERS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance a letter from Mr. George A. Hormel, of Beverly Hills, Calif., dated June 14, 1937, and addressed to me, relating to retirement plans for industrial workers.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEVERLY HILLS, CALIF., June 14, 1937.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Views on not alone the most humane bill that the present Congress should consider but a bill that will contribute most effectually toward solving the unemployment problem and will add greatly to business recovery are presented herein.

No matter in what position we serve, whether as an executive in business or as a wage earner in the shop or the office, we are all supplying one another's needs; we are interdependent one upon the other and all are entitled to an adequate and comfortable living after years of work.

All wage earners are making their contribution to the welfare of the Nation, as are those on the Federal pay roll. Therefore an old-age pension should not be left to the discretion of our employers or State legislators. It should be strictly a Federal obligation, to be paid in the same spirit and for the same purpose as the pension provided for the Army and Navy and for those serving in other Federal departments.

Wage earners work for your interests and mine. They contribute their part in giving us the highest living standards in the world. They have labored in the development of the world's greatest industrial and financial nation, yet when these workers pass the age of 50 their efficiency decreases. The younger generations come on and take their places, and they go into the discard like a worn-out machine, and frequently even before 60 become dependents either upon the community or their relatives.

Beyond this, at no time has the wage earner received more than enough to barely house, feed, and clothe his family and educate his children. In many instances the worker has also suffered accidents and because of exposure incident to industry he may have fallen into ill-health. Finally it has been impossible for him to accumulate a surplus or reserve for his old age.

Look at this picture. The writer started business in 1892 with a retail meat market, employing three men. The first year 610 hogs were slaughtered. In financial worth he was on an equal basis with his men, for he used borrowed money. He had no educational or other advantage over these men except that he was proprietor of the business. The men were paid top wages, but in spite of careful spending could save very little by the end of the year. Because of their labors, however, there was sufficient profit for the business to finance double the activities the following year. The second year 8 and 10 men were employed, and the pay roll has increased each succeeding year until now it numbers more than 4,000, and the average slaughter of animals for 1936 was 5,800 daily.

In the beginning the three men employed were skilled workmen and knew more than the writer did about the meat business. As additional skilled men were employed they were constantly urged to produce quality product at a minimum of cost. The writer worked with his men in overalls until he was 40 and he was aware that they were thinking as hard as he was how to improve the product and put into practice efficiency methods. Each step forward meant increased business and greater profits. The commonest laborer made his contribution toward the success of the business. Every industrial employer can tell the same story if he will speak the truth.

We have reached a crisis. Business America, in order to keep pace with the progress made through science and invention, must wake up and share more liberally the wealth of our Nation with those who have contributed so largely in the creation of that wealth. It is not scriptural for people to suffer want and hunger and go poorly clad or housed in a land where there is plenty for all and much to spare.

Business America is abundantly able to support an adequate annuity plan of at least $100 per month for those past their earning years. However, pressure must be brought to bear upon American business leadership to the point where they will recognize this responsibility as theirs and cooperate with Government in the solution of this economic problem. If this is not done—and I hope it may be done during the present session of Congress—it will be difficult to maintain our democratic form of government.

A retirement plan will help solve the unemployment problem and open positions for our younger people. It will greatly increase buying power that will be permanent and will stabilize business. In a large measure it will prevent depressions. It will lighten the problem of farm relief. It will eliminate, to a large degree, charitable institutions. It will greatly reduce Federal relief spending. A retirement plan is the paramount need of today.

Respectfully yours,

GEO. A. HORMEL,
Chairman of the Board, Geo. A. Hormel & Co.

GOVERNOR OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS—REPORT OF NOMINATION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as in executive session, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, I report back favorably the nomination of Lawrence W. Cramer, of New York, to be Governor of the Virgin Islands, and ask that it be placed on the Executive Calendar. I ask publicly at this time that this nomination be not brought up except when I am present, because I should like to have something to say about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be received, as in executive session, and placed on the Executive Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

By Mr. COPELAND (for himself and Mr. WAGNER):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) authorizing Federal participation in the New York World's Fair, 1939; to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. POPE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6958, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 8, line 5, to strike out "$240,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$265,000"; and

On page 8, line 7, to strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000."

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN TAXES—AMENDMENT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be offered by me to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 375) to provide revenue, and for other purposes. The proposed amendment relates to a change in the undistributed profits tax. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the proposed amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

ADMINISTRATION OF AGRICULTURAL POLICIES—ADDRESS BY SENATOR M'GILL

[Mr. McKELLAR asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of the administration of agricultural policies, delivered by Senator McGILL on June 17th instant, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE CRISIS IN AMERICA—ADDRESS BY PAUL BLOCK

[Mr. DAVIS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "The Crisis in America", delivered by Paul Block at St. Francis College, Loretta, Pa., on June 11, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR INFERIOR FEDERAL COURTS—EDITORIAL FROM PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

[Mr. DAVIS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Flying Squadron of Itinerant Judges", published in the Philadelphia Inquirer of Friday, June 18, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

PUNISHMENT FOR THE CRIME OF LYNCHING

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I wish to ask him a question as to the status of the so-called Gavagan bill, which is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does the Senator refer to what is known as the antilynching bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest that the Senator make it definite.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in reply to the question of the able Senator from Pennsylvania, I have to say that House bill 1507, the so-called Gavagan antilynching bill, came to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on May 5 last. A subcommittee was appointed consisting of Senators VAN NUYS, chairman, MCCARRAN, DIETERICH, NORRIS, and AUSTIN.

Prior to that time another so-called antilynching bill, Senate bill 1709, introduced jointly by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] was referred to a subcommittee composed of Senators VAN NUYS, chairman, MCCARRAN, DIETERICH, NORRIS, and AUSTIN. The subcommittee on the antilynching bills, which bills were considered together, has reported favorably.

On June 14 the subcommittee reported to the whole committee favorably in the following manner, by substituting the Wagner-Van Nuys antilynching bill for the Gavagan bill (H. R. 1507).

Hence, in reply to the question of the able Senator, the antilynching bill is pending before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on a favorable report from the subcommittee. I do not suppose the Senator wishes to have me at this time give a description of the difference between the two bills. The bill reported favorably by the subcommittee will soon be considered by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. I doubt whether the committee will consider it next Monday, but I assure the Senator that within a fortnight the bill will be considered. Of course, I do not know that the report will be favorable or unfavorable. Personally, I am in favor of such legislation, and shall so vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I thank the Senator.

RELIEF APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) making appropriations for relief purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment of Mr. ROBINSON to the amendment of the committee is, on page 4, line 17, to strike out "40" and insert in lieu thereof "25"; after the word "services", in line 18, page 4, to insert a period and strike out the remainder of the amendment down to and including the word "supply", in line 23, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That if the President shall find any project to be necessary in order to provide work relief in the community where the project is to be located, and that the applicant is unable to supply 25 percent of the cost as herein required, he may authorize the project upon such contribution or assurance of contribution as he finds that the applicant is able to make.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment now under consideration was discussed all day yesterday but no conclusion was reached. Anticipating that the debate on the amendment may be approaching an end, I take the floor for the purpose of discussing briefly the pending question, namely, the amendment offered by me to the committee amendment. Let me say that it is not my intention to ask a prolonged hearing but rather to be as brief as may be practicable.

The amendment to the committee amendment was suggested in the belief that it would afford a basis of fair compromise for the differences that have been revealed in connection with the committee amendment requiring a contribution of 40 percent by applicants for Works Progress Administration projects.

In suggesting the amendment to the committee amendment there is no thought that the requirements for relief during the next fiscal year will be reduced below the general standard fixed in the joint resolution now before the Senate. At one time I thought that it might be practicable to reduce the $1,500,000,000 contemplated to be appropriated; but my studies of the subject have led to the conclusion that such action probably would result either in supplemental or in deficiency appropriations reaching, at least, the maximum of the amount provided by the House joint resolution.

It seems to me, however, in view of the conditions that prevail with respect to employment, that it is now consistent to impose some limitations and restrictions on the use of these funds in order to keep the amount as nearly as may be within the limit provided for in the joint resolution.

In my judgment, there is little basis for the argument that for Congress to require a contribution from those who are able to make it will prove oppressive. We have habitually required local agencies and authorities to make contributions to Federal expenditures in other connections, and the practice has prevailed with regard to W. P. A. projects.

The Administrator now has unlimited discretion. The amendment would restrict his discretion. In making the restriction there is no thought of any reflection on his motives or on the manner in which he has performed his services. Mr. Hopkins undoubtedly has had the most difficult task of any officer ever employed by the Government of the United States. The difficulties inhere in the nature of the problems with which he deals and with the subject matter dealt with as well.

Under the present practice some sponsors of projects are required to contribute very large sums, whereas others are permitted to contribute very small amounts. Without reflecting on the motives of anyone, it is apparent that the system is calculated to invite or provoke drafts on the Federal Treasury. Local agencies are prompted to make the best showing they can and to get as liberal aid from Federal funds as may be possible. As a result, we have perhaps projects in some communities which do not require them. The object in my mind is not to impose hardship on anyone, neither on the President, who nominally is charged with making the allotments, nor on Mr. Hopkins, nor on those who are the beneficiaries of the Federal appropriations. The time has not yet come when expenditures of this nature may be discontinued.

It does not seem necessary to enter into a discussion of the question as to whether it will always be expedient to "spend in order to save." There is something about that maxim or slogan which, to my mind, is somewhat inconsistent with sound principles and policies. Yet it must be admitted that throughout the depression period liberal sums have been advanced—some have been loans, others have been grants—in the hope that such a course would promote private employment and stimulate industry and business. Private employers have not been hasty in accepting their share of the burden incident to prevailing conditions. There has been, of course, a notable increase in the number employed in industry, and reductions have been made in the number of persons on the relief rolls. Such reductions during the last year have been very substantial, and under the pending joint resolution they will of necessity continue to be made if the aggregate amount spent is to be kept within the limits or approximately within the limits of $1,500,000 during the next fiscal year.

With the thought in mind that nothing should be written into the legislation which would prevent our relief agencies from being extended to those who imperatively require assistance, and also with the thought in mind that the method of administration should not be unduly cumbersome or difficult, the amendment to the committee amendment has been presented. In many instances no difficulty will arise under it. In numerous instances, no doubt, applications will be made for practically the whole amount necessary for the project to be paid out of Federal funds. The object is not to impose an unfair or unjust burden upon anyone, but to see that a just and reasonable share under this very essential legislation shall be assumed by those who are in a position to do so, those who are able to do so. For that reason the proposal in my amendment is to reduce the maximum amount required to 25 percent. That was suggested by the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] a day or two ago, and approximately that same percentage was suggested by a number of other Senators, including myself.

What would happen if the amendment should be adopted? Every dollar of the $1,500,000,000 will be spent in all probability, and the savings that will be accomplished will result in the avoidance of deficiencies or supplemental appropriations. Of course, one may hope, if he endorses the proposal, that some savings may result out of the $1,500,000,000, but I frankly state I do not believe that to be very probable. In any event we are continuing the relief work for another year, and our aim is or should be to meet the necessities of the situation without being extravagant or in any event improvident.

During the early stages of the depression, when conditions which need not now be described were so desperate as to arouse here anxiety in the hearts of all of us, we felt warranted in being exceedingly liberal. The result of that policy has been, in some degree at least, to create a demand for a continuance of that policy even after its necessity has discontinued or has been lessened. It is to obviate those conditions in part that the amendment is proposed.

I maintain with confidence that no unjust burden will be imposed upon the Administrator should the amendment be adopted. He will perform the same duties as now with the exception that he would be given a standard as to the amount that should be contributed if the applicants are able to make the contribution. In a sense that will be a protection to him. That will afford a basis of relieving him from any claim of partiality that may have arisen during the administration of similar statutes in the past.

It will never be possible to administer an act of this kind to the satisfaction of everyone. As I said in the beginning, there inhere in the task such difficulties as to make that desirable end impracticable, if not impossible. It is believed, however, that a somewhat uniform standard may be erected without working hardship on those who are to benefit by the legislation.

Should any city, community, or other applicant for a non-Federal project—and this amendment relates only to non-Federal projects—find itself unable to meet the modest standard required in the amendment, namely, to pay 25 percent of the amount necessary to complete the project, it would be expected to establish that fact to the satisfaction of the Administrator. The joint resolution says "the President." Of course, the President does not in person perform the tasks that are associated with the administration of these laws. He must rely on his agents, on executives in the departments, and principally on the Administrator. The amendment as drafted does not specify in what manner the conclusion may be reached. It is realized that there might be some criticism of that fact, that the amendment may not be regarded as sufficiently definite to secure the standard where it ought to be preserved; but, on the other hand, the essence of relief is reasonably prompt action, and if any legislation should be enacted which would make that difficult or impossible, the purposes of the appropriation would be thwarted. Any facts brought to the knowledge of the Administrator or the President which justify the conclusion that the applicant is unable to meet the 25-percent contribution would justify the President in proceeding with the project, provided it is also clear that the project is necessary as a work-relief project.

I am not criticizing anyone for engaging in an effort to do the best he can for his community. We do that here sometimes, even though the National Treasury may not be well safeguarded when we do it. But if a liberal Administrator, like Mr. Hopkins, or a liberal President, like President Roosevelt, find that the applicants for a project are able to pay 25 percent, it seems to me it is good policy to require them to pay that amount and to pay more if they are able to do so.

I should like to have someone give a reason, if there is a reason, why that is not sound policy. If they are unable to pay and the project is necessary for work relief—I mean by that, necessary primarily as a work-relief project; I do not mean that it may be one that may be used as a means of giving some employment, but if it is primarily a work-relief project—the President can still go forward with it under this amendment, when the conclusion as to that fact is reached. If it is not primarily a work-relief project, if it is an effort upon the part of some organization, some chamber of commerce, some city, some town, or some county to have Federal funds expended for improvements and advantages that have little relation to the subject of work relief, we ought not to premiumize that. We ought to require a stricter standard than would be applicable in case of a project which is purely a work-relief project.

We all know that it has been necessary for the Administrator to go out and look for projects in communities where people were unemployed and threatened with suffering, and sometimes the projects have been subjected to criticism because on their face and by their name they have appeared simple and rather trivial, not very closely related to the public welfare. I do not criticize that action, because our object in spending Federal funds is, first, to afford assistance to those who must have it, and second, to get as much advantage as it may be found practicable to obtain in the appropriations we make for that purpose.

In my judgment, this amendment will accomplish that. It will not leave without aid any project shown to be necessary for work relief where the sponsors are unable to make contribution in the amount of 25 percent.

Some will say that there is something humiliating in finding or in reaching the conclusion that proponents of a project are unable to meet any standard of contribution. Substantially that statement was made on the floor of the Senate yesterday. I question the soundness of any such declaration. The whole basis for this legislation is the inability of those who benefit to carry on without it. We cannot appropriate one dollar for relief without reaching the conclusion that it is necessary in order to assist those who would have great difficulty in carrying on without the assistance.

Anyone may assert that it is unreasonable, it is unjust, it is embarrassing, it is humiliating to say that there must be a showing as to the ability or inability of those seeking Federal funds as to what they themselves can do; but have we come to that state of mind in legislating where we want to encourage or even countenance indifference, lack of diligence, total lack of thrift and energy? Have we come to the point where we wish to say, "The less you do or attempt to do, the more we will do"? Stated in that manner, of course, no one can question the proposal. The only issue is whether the amendment, if fairly interpreted and applied, would deprive any applicant of a project that ought to be carried on in order to prevent the suffering which the whole relief program is intended to relieve.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I have listened to the Senator's amendment, and I have listened, of course, to his reasoning. In fact, I may confide that the reason why I was delayed this morning in my attendance upon the Senate was that I was in a conference looking to what could be done to remove any objections, if there be such, to the amendment. But I ask the Senator, after listening to his statement, if the President should grant to my city of Chicago—as I have made clear my interest—an amount of funds for the purpose of constructing an airport, or a subway, or any other public undertaking, would he not, under the present law, have the right within his own power to say, "Before I grant you this you will have to assure me that you will provide a certain sum"? Is not that inherently within the power of the President now without the amendment of the honorable Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. The President may say, "You must put up 5 percent," or he may say, "You must put up 50 percent," or he may say, "You must put up 75 percent." I said that in the beginning. But, Mr. President, the Government has been liberal to Arkansas. It has been liberal to the city of Chicago. I do not know any reason why we should commit ourselves to building as a relief proposition an airport in Chicago—taking the illustration of my friend the Senator from Illinois—without requiring Chicago to contribute 25 percent of the amount required; and I should hate to think, although it might be true, that Chicago would find such a project necessary as a work-relief project and yet be unable to contribute one-fourth of the amount required for that work-relief project.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the able Senator from Arkansas permit a further interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Will not the Senator suggest also that there might be instances where the President might say, "Mr. Applicant, you ought to put up 50 percent", if he had the evidence which would justify it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. I said in the beginning that under this amendment the President could require a greater sum than 25 percent, and would do so if the applicant were able to meet it and if the project were a desirable work-relief project. Certainly that is fundamental. That was the first proposition with which I started out. If I did not make it clear, it is due to that defect in my power of expression which is so much in contrast with the splendid abilities and notable verbosity of my good friend the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, while I appreciate the suggestion as to the circumlocutory ratiocination in which I sometimes indulge, I still would like to have my able and eminent friend from Arkansas explain why the amendment is necessary at all for any purpose then, if it is already in the power of the President to use his discretion as to the amount of local contribution to be required.

Mr. ROBINSON. I can give the Senator from Illinois the explanation; but great God! I respectfully decline to give him understanding. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. One cannot confer that which he does not possess. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, this colloquy is all in the best of good humor. I think, speaking now on the subject raised by the Senator from Illinois, it is important that a reasonable standard be fixed in the legislation.

Congress has the first responsibility touching Federal expenditures. Not one dollar can be taken out of the Treasury except upon an appropriation. Why is that? The legislative department has control of the purse strings. It is charged, under our Constitution, with that responsibility. Is there anything unreasonable in Congress saying that if Chicago wants an airport as a work-relief project she shall pay 25 percent, if that great city is able to pay it? If you think so, vote against the amendment. But we all know that practically the political subdivisions, with some few possible exceptions, some small communities, would find themselves able to meet this requirement if they were commanded to do so in order to get the projects going.

Mr. President, that is not the test of the argument, however. If a city like Chicago satisfies the President or the Administrator that it cannot put up 25 percent of the cost of an airport in Chicago, and that it is really a work-relief project, and not an effort on the part of the officials in Chicago to get the Federal Government to do something for Chicago which Chicago ought to do for itself, the project will still go forward.

There is nothing humiliating about saying, "I am unable to do this"; there is nothing humiliating in the finding that one is unable to do it, provided it is a good, wholesome work-relief project, because the whole theory of our legislation on work relief is that beneficiaries are unable to get along without it. That is the whole basis for it. Nobody has ever attempted to justify it otherwise.

I said a while ago that Congress and the Administrator have been liberal with Arkansas, and they have been liberal with Chicago. I am not going into that subject in detail; but I do pay a tribute to the administrator of the work relief in Arkansas, Mr. Floyd Sharp, and I recognize the fact that Mr. Hopkins himself has, by wise and good counsel, assisted very materially in that very helpful undertaking conducted by Mr. Sharp under Mr. Hopkins' general supervision.

I can understand why Mr. Hopkins would prefer to have no restriction at all. He is accustomed to that method of procedure. But I cannot understand why Congress should say we will impose no restrictions at a time when the Federal debt is higher than it was ever known in history, at a time when private enterprise is in measure more prosperous than it was even in the year 1929.

Congress has some responsibility in these matters. I accept my full share of responsibility for the legislation we have passed heretofore. I believed then, and I believe now, it was exceedingly helpful. But, in my opinion, conditions have changed so that there is no longer the necessity for inviting projects which primarily are not work projects, but are improvement projects which ought to be carried on independent of the work-relief program.

No one need challenge me to cite instances of that nature. No one need tell me that there are no places in which the representatives of local political subdivisions have exerted their influence, appealed to their Representatives and to their Senators, in order to get funds out of the Federal Treasury for projects which were not primarily necessary work-relief projects, but which were of great advantage to the communities in which they were constructed. So long as we impose no limitation, the Administrator will be encountered with that difficulty. He will be encountered with the difficulty of having Senators and Representatives come to him supporting local influences and asking for projects which, to say the least, are not in the first aspect designed to promote work relief. I could discuss that phase of the subject indefinitely; I could cite some instances where projects have been carried forward which might be subject to that criticism; but my thought is that Congress has a responsibility in the matter.

Gentlemen may laugh about a $36,000,000,000 debt hanging over the Treasury of the United States if they wish to, but with all my refined and expanded sense of humor I find it impossible to laugh about such a thing. I recall the time when our armies came out of the bloodiest and most cruel war that was ever waged on this earth to find a debt far below the amount the Government now owes, and we worried about it then. But now nobody seems to worry about the debt. We spend and we spend and we spend, and there are some who vote for all appropriations and against all taxes. I do not name anyone; sometimes I have been inclined to get into that class myself. But the point I am making is that we cannot go on forever doing it.

I do not say that even a thirty-six and one-half billion dollar debt, taking into consideration all the circumstances, endangers the credit of the United States; but I do say that in the time of prosperity we ought to begin to put our house in order. Let me ask what would happen if another depression, such as that which began in 1929 or 1930, and which has continued until recently, should strike the people of the United States and their affairs next year or the year following? Of course we do not look for it, of course we hope it will not occur, but there are some who say that we will have a recession in business and industry.

What if our revenues from incomes should fall off? What if the sources of taxation available for the United States should dry up to an extent, as they did dry up in 1930 and in the years which immediately followed that year? We would find ourselves in a situation which would be terrible; and as representatives of the whole people, expressing full appreciation for the liberality of the Government, we owe an obligation to the Government, to those who live now and to those who will come after, to make provision for the needy living, for those who cannot get along without assistance; but we also owe the generations to come a measure of duty to safeguard them against an unreasonable and an excessive burden which may bring back upon them the sorrows, the travails, and the woes we have so recently experienced.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have had as fair an opportunity as any Senator to examine into the facts respecting this work-relief appropriation. I say that because my membership on the Committee on Appropriations has given me perhaps a better chance than many Senators have had to study the various phases of the unemployment problem.

I wish to confess frankly to the Senate that I started out with the same general idea as that which has been expressed by the Senator from South Carolina and by the Senator from Arkansas, that Congress should establish by legislation a minimum standard of sponsors' contributions to non-Federal work-relief projects. But the more I have examined into the facts the more I am convinced that I do not now have the information upon which to fix that standard, and therefore in good conscience I cannot vote either for the proposal originally submitted by the Senator from South Carolina or for the amendment to that proposal suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

If I were compelled to act upon the information I now have, I should modify the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] first by cutting the percentage of sponsors' contribution at least in half. I do not believe that it should be above 20 percent. That in itself would be a very material increase—almost a doubling of the average contribution throughout the country during the past fiscal year. It would more closely approximate what is now being contributed generally by sponsors throughout the United States. Mr. Hopkins' latest figures show that the average contribution is about 18 percent.

The second objection I have to both proposals is that this required contribution is to be attached to each individual project, and yet the statistics upon which the amount of that contribution is calculated are not based upon each individual project. They are based upon State averages. Every table that has been published in the House hearings or in the Senate hearings, and every table that has been brought to the attention of the Senate, relates to a State average contribution. Those averages are naturally made up of light contributions by sponsors in some classes of work-relief projects and heavy contributions in other classes of such projects.

If either of the proposed amendments shall be adopted, then in order to operate fairly provision should be made that in each State the average contribution should be a certain percentage, and that is perfectly practical. The most encouraging thing from the point of view of the United States Treasury in connection with this appropriation is the adoption by the House of Representatives, and its cheerful acceptance by Mr. Hopkins, of the provision now in the joint resolution that the $1,500,000,000 is to be divided into 12 parts and allocated for monthly expenditures, thereby insuring that a deficiency appropriation will not be necessary to care further for relief during the next fiscal year. Heretofore Congress has appropriated lump sums to meet an emergency, and then facts have been presented which caused Congress, in the middle of a session, to appropriate more money for the same purpose. This is the first time that the appropriation for the Works Progress Administration has been reduced to an annual basis. The rule imposed by the Bureau of the Budget on all departments is that they must take an appropriation and divide it into 12 parts. Mr. Hopkins assured our committee that he would live up to the letter and the spirit of the direction given to him in this provision adopted by the House of Representatives and recommended by your committee.

This rule will be of great advantage in that every State administrator will first know for 6 months—that is, from July to December—exactly what minimum amount of money can be expended in his State for work relief each month. If the State W. P. A. administrator knows the amount of money he is going to have from month to month he can intelligently plan the work to be undertaken. So that this wise provision inserted in the joint resolution by the House can properly be carried out, the State administrator should be at liberty to arrange his projects so that the sponsor's contribution on some will go as high as perhaps to a half or more, and others may be undertaken at a less percent than the average. There are classes of projects, such as the white-collar projects and the women's projects, where the sponsors' contributions under no circumstances could reach even as much as the 20 percent that I have suggested.

If this joint resolution leaves it to the discretion of the State W. P. A. administrators to get more in one case and less in another, as the local circumstances warrant, but with the positive direction that when he totals up his activities for the month the average sponsors' contributions on all projects shall equal a certain percentage, then the effect upon the Federal Treasury would be exactly the same as though Congress had required that each project have an identical sponsor's contribution.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. In line with the suggestion now being made by the Senator from Arizona, he, as a member of the committee, will recall that I offered an amendment carrying out the thought which he is now expressing. That amendment was—

> That an average of approximately 18 percent of the total cost of all the projects in each State shall be supplied in each State from non-Federal funds.

That amendment was voted down by a vote of 13 to 10.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me say to the Senate that the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana in the committee was not only sound and wise but entirely practical. It could be carried out by each State administrator, and as I have pointed out, the effect upon the Treasury would be exactly the same. That is a serious objection I have to both the proposal submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and to the modification proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I disagree as to the method of assessing the sponsor's contribution. I am convinced that the contribution should be based upon a State average rather than upon individual projects.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Administrator was opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. Mr. Hopkins came before the committee and stated his opposition to that amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Hopkins was no more opposed to the proposal made by the Senator from Louisiana than he was to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I was going on to say that I did not know whether he was opposed to one more than the other; but so long as we are discussing what took place in the committee, I will say that he was opposed to the amendment presented by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure that the record will show that Mr. Hopkins was asked which amendment he would choose if were he compelled to decide between what he considered two evils, and that he said be preferred the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BYRNES. I think the record will show that he was opposed to both amendments. As the Senator from Arizona also said, in the committee he voted for 27 percent, was it, or was it 28 percent?

Mr. HAYDEN. I voted for a sponsors' contribution of anything less than 40 percent.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator voted for 28 percent.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona, like I did, voted for the lesser of two evils when he was confronted by two evils.

Mr. HAYDEN. The third objection I have to both of these proposals is the length of time specified within which they shall go into effect. I do not believe it is possible within 90 days after the 1st of next July for the States, the counties, the local communities, or the various other public bodies which act as sponsors, so to arrange their affairs that they can undertake new projects under this revised arrangement. If I were compelled to pass judgment upon the matter, I would say that there should be at least 6 months, or up to the end of the present year, in which to carry on under the existing program, while preparing for the new, particularly in view of the fact that month by month, as the record shows, the amount of sponsor's contribution is increasing throughout the United States, due to pressure applied by Mr. Hopkins and the State administrators.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The provision of the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] which has disturbed me most is that of an arbitrary amount of 40 percent in the one case and 25 percent in the other.

I will ask the Senator from Arizona if the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas does not furnish something in the nature of an escape from that arbitrary proposition.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, it not only furnishes an escape—it opens wide the gates and lets down the bars, so that anything the Administrator wants to do can, in his discretion, be done. There was some virtue in the proposal made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in that he did require the applicant to go through the form of taking a pauper's oath. That made it an uncomfortable way of getting the money. The proposal made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] leaves it to be done in a genteel, polite way, without any stigma at all being attached to seeking a less sponsor's contribution than the normal 25 percent.

Mr. BORAH. Then, as I understand the Senator from Arizona, he thinks that the element of arbitrariness in the statement of the amount has been eliminated by the proposal made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]?

Mr. HAYDEN. In practical effect, there is no doubt about that.

What I should like to see Congress do is to fix, in all fairness, a standard which would be applicable to all States, and thereby reduce the discretion of the President or of the Works Progress Administrator, so that when Congress makes an appropriation for work relief we may be sure that all States will be treated alike. I believe it to be possible to do that if we study this problem long enough and hard enough.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is a member of the Appropriations Committee, and I am sure he remembers that 2 years ago, I think it was, Mr. Hopkins came before our committee and was questioned about some definite policy with regard to relief. We requested him at that hearing to try to formulate some definite policy which would more or less apply, with such elasticity as might be requisite, to the whole country. A year intervened after that, and then we had a debate here on the floor, but no policy was forthcoming. Now the second year has intervened and no policy has been forthcoming, although we renewed our request last year for some definite policy.

It is only fair to say that Mr. Hopkins or anybody else would have a great deal of difficulty in formulating such a policy, and therefore, we are down to the point where we have debated this thing three times, and we are exactly where we were when we started. As I foresee, conditions will change so from year to year that I doubt if we shall ever formulate a policy unless we commence to do it.

I want to couple with that observation a question to the Senator from Arizona. Does not the Senator from Arizona feel that the money herewith appropriated will be expended more or less along the same line, with the amendment as without it?

Mr. HAYDEN. In practical effect that is the evident intention of the Senator from Arkansas, except that there will be set up a general indication which may or may not be followed with respect to the percentages of sponsors' contributions.

Mr. TYDINGS. Taking the remark of the Senator from Arizona, namely, that there is elasticity and loopholes in this proposal, does not the Senator think that at least we ought to make the start, provided that in making that start there is enough elasticity so that no place needing relief is going to be penalized? If we do not make that start now, when in heaven's name will we make it, particularly when we have been working for three solid years trying to get some kind of a national permanent policy?

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me state my position, Mr. President. I should prefer to see less elasticity if a fair rule could be devised.

The Senator says that Congress has asked the administrative officers for a statement of policy, and we cannot get it. The Senate, however, has acted recently in two instances looking to the establishment of a sound policy with respect to relief expenditures: First, on the 10th day of June the Senate adopted a resolution, submitted by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], under which the Vice President has appointed five very able Senators—to do what? They are "authorized and directed to study, survey, and investigate the problems of unemployment and relief."

The problems of unemployment and relief, so far as the Congress is concerned with dollars and cents, are the problems faced by the Works Progress Administration. Under this resolution the special Senate committee is bound to look into those problems; and one of the very first things that a committee of Senators interested in protecting the Treasury would do would be to determine whether local communities might properly contribute more and thereby make the Federal contribution less.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, I do not think any Senator on the floor wants to adopt such a drastic amendment that men really deserving of help from these funds will be denied it. There is a difference of opinion as to how far we can go; that is all; but I am constrained to remind the Senator that, as he himself knows, in the case of every appropriation bill that comes before the committee the committee realize that we are appropriating a great deal of money that we do not have in mind and which we will have to borrow. We ought to realize that there will have to be an end to that.

When the farm bill comes before the Appropriations Committee and later before the Senate, and we attempt, in either or both places, to reduce it somewhat, everyone will say, "Do not start by reducing these appropriations or putting restrictions around them on this farm bill; Heaven knows we do not want to start on the farmer." So it is with each and every appropriation bill, including the relief bill. Naturally, it is not desired to start on relief appropriations. The point is that we do not really want to start anywhere.

Mr. HAYDEN. I not only want to start but am anxious to make an intelligent start.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not mean the Senator, but I mean, unless we can get some sort of an elastic standard which we can tighten, in the light of the very investigation to which the Senator alludes, as circumstances and facts allow us to tighten it, we are never going to get any place.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is my opinion that if the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas shall be adopted, expenditures for work relief will continue in practically the same manner as though no such legislative action had been taken. We will carry on just as we have been doing. Why not brush aside what amounts to a mere gesture and allow a committee of five excellent Senators, who are keenly interested in the problem of unemployment and relief, and in whom we all have confidence, to make a report to the Senate in January upon this very question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to reflect upon the Senators who are members of the committee referred to—I know they are able and good men, and I know they are going to make an investigation—but this is a pretty big country of 48 States, and a great many cities, and my prediction is that next year, after the Appropriations Committee comes in with another relief appropriation bill, we are going to have the same debate we had 2 years ago, 1 year ago, and have today, and we are never, never, never going to write any restrictions into any of these bills until something in the way of financial difficulty compels us to do it. Then we will be in the position of not having done the right thing by the people of the country. I make that prediction.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. May I say to the Senator from Maryland that he must admit there has been some little progress made, in that we even had a committee authorized. The proposal creating such a committee was pending before Congress at the last session but was never acted upon. However, not only was the resolution acted upon at this session and adopted by the Senate, but also another resolution creating an independent commission to make a very similar study of the same question was adopted. I say, at least, the Senate has made some progress in taking that amount of cognizance of the situation.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield first to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to deny that it has made some progress; I concede it, as it has had a committee appointed; but I imagine if we make comparable progress in the next 15 or 20 years to that we have made for the last 3 years, certainly by 1956 we will have formulated a rather elastic policy which will, at least, give us a starting point to perfect it before the year 2000.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. The mountain labored and brought forth a committee.

Mr. HAYDEN. And created a most excellent committee, a committee of five Senators, who command the respect and good opinion of all their colleagues in this body.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona permit one additional interruption?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. Does the Senator from North Carolina think that no such investigation or study should be made?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think it was a fine thing when the mountain brought forth a mouse; I approve it.

While I am on my feet may I ask the Senator from Arizona a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. As I understand, the bill carries a billion and a half dollars direct and about $200,000,000 for unexpended or unallocated balances. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. My judgment is that the unexpended balances which may be available from all sources will be between $60,000,000 and $70,000,000.

Mr. BAILEY. We have heretofore provided $350,000,000 for the C. C. C. next year; we have provided for social security, which, in its present stage, at any rate, is in the nature of relief, $214,000,000; and, in addition to that, we have provided $36,000,000 for the old-age pension feature of it. Furthermore, we have provided $300,000,000 for the P. W. A. The total of that is $2,500,000,000. That is what we are appropriating for relief of the unemployed and the necessitous of the country. I ask the Senator if that is any progress at all?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; it is a material reduction under the relief appropriation for 1 year of $3,300,000,000 and is a reduction under the relief appropriation of $4,800,000,000 for another year.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the $3,300,000,000 appropriation did not all go to relieve necessitous, but the President used large portions of it to put in departments here and to set up whatever he pleased. That is in the record.

Mr. HAYDEN. Nevertheless, the purpose of the appropriation was to relieve unemployment generally, and this billion and a half will be spent for that same purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is on the Appropriations Committee, is he not? Is he prepared to tell me how much of the $3,300,000,000 or of the other fund, the $4,800,000,000, was expended under the power which we gave the President for purposes other than unemployment relief and the relief of distress?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am not prepared to furnish those figures to the Senator, and I doubt if he himself, even with a very diligent search, could ascertain the exact facts without many weeks of work.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish the Senate to hear the statement of the Senator from Arizona. He says even with a diligent search one cannot ascertain the facts; and I think that is true, although it is very lamentable, if it is true. We appropriated $4,800,000,000 plus $3,300,000,000, which totals $8,100,000,000, and a very able and alert member of the Appropriations Committee, and a most capable Senator, informs us none of us can tell what was done with the money.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am not revealing any secret but just stating a fact that is common knowledge on the part of all members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a fact, and is a commentary on us all. We need to bring forth something more than a mouse from that committee just now. Here is $2,600,000—it is not $1,500,000,000—and I should like the Senator to comment on that and tell me how much progress we are making.

Mr. HAYDEN. Obviously we are making substantial progress.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well; let us hear about it.

Mr. HAYDEN. We are making material progress in the reduction of relief expenditures, and I believe greater progress can be made. If I may be permitted, I will say to the Senator that the proposal now pending before the Senate in the form of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would leave things practically as they are. I would recognize that fact and reject both his substitute and the proposal made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I would depend upon the able committee of five Senators to look into the very question which concerns us now. It is the first problem that will face the committee for solution.

I know that the five Senators will not fail to earnestly examine into it, and I hope—and I express that hope here in their presence—that they will bring in, not some indefinite, vague, nebulous sort of a rule with respect to sponsors' contributions that may or may not apply in particular cases, but will lay down a firm and fixed rule that will be fair and equal to all the States.

In addition to the committee of five Senators, the Senate very shortly afterwards, on June 14, adopted a joint resolution calling upon the President to appoint a commission, to be composed of from 5 to 15 well-qualified and distinguished citizens, "to conduct a national study of the whole problem of unemployment and relief and make recommendations looking to a comprehensive, inteligent, and just policy for the future." In the preamble of that resolution, as approved by the Senate, it is recited that there is need of a thoroughgoing study of—

(1) The extent and nature of unemployment and relief needs, (2) the problem of work as against direct relief, (3) the question of assessing the financial burden and administrative responsibilities as between private charitable organizations and local, State, and Federal governments.

That last direction to the Commission is the very question we are now discussing.

In other words, we have appointed two juries to ascertain the facts. The juries are empaneled so far as the Senate is concerned. The President has indicated that he has that very kind of an investigation under way, and the purpose of the joint resolution is to implement what he proposes to do by a committee which shall report to Congress. Why should we now bring in a verdict before the two juries authorized by the Senate have had a chance to look into the facts as we have directed them to do?

For these reasons, I cannot support either the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] or the substitute proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE. While it is true the investigations are authorized, why does the Senator object to a verdict of the kind he has described under the Robinson amendment as a verdict that will still make it possible to do everything that has been done during the past year? If that is so, if this saving clause really leaves the matter open so that every worth-while project may be approved even without any contribution from a sponsor, what possible objection does the Senator have to the Congress setting up a standard and saying, "This is what we think the sponsor ought to do"?

Mr. HAYDEN. I want to see a standard established that is a real standard and means something, rather than merely a guidepost indicating a general direction in which to travel, but omitting to specify how far to go.

Mr. BURKE. It would be at least some satisfaction to know we are traveling in the right direction even if we are not going very fast.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am satisfied we are doing that, anyway. The proof is conclusive before the Appropriations Committee that we are traveling in the right direction because every year, and in the first quarter of this year, the record shows an increase in the contributions by sponsors throughout the entire United States to all Works Progress Administration projects.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a telegram, received from my home city of Omaha, which indicates that throughout the country there is some misunderstanding as to the effect of the Byrnes amendment and the Robinson amendment. I wish to comment on that phase of the matter for just a moment. The telegram is signed by the chairman of the municipal airport of the city of Omaha and reads as follows:

Advised Senate may require 40-percent contribution by sponsors for W. P. A. projects. Municipal air field our most important project now in very incomplete condition. Omaha financially unable to meet proposed contribution which would leave our air field practically unusable and destroy Omaha's air service. Strongly feel proposal should not apply to present projects.

I have received many other telegrams along the same line, indicating that throughout the country many people are being led to believe that the adoption of either the Byrnes amendment or the Robinson amendment would interfere with such projects. Of course, a reading of either amendment shows that is not true in any sense of the word, because the contribution in each case, whether it be 40 percent or 25 percent, is to apply only to new projects. Neither amendment has any bearing at all upon the Omaha airport or any project now under way.

More than that, all projects which are started within the next 3 months are not required to come within the terms of either amendment. It has been argued that we cannot properly, suddenly, overnight, change from the more or less slipshod method in force, and require a definite contribution. To meet that situation both amendments provide that they shall apply only to new projects, and only to such new projects as may be started after the 30th of next September; so that 3 full months are allowed for the sponsors to make whatever change these very moderate amendments, or either of them, would require.

One other thought should be kept in mind also, and that is that the country has been well educated to the necessity of sponsored projects by the 4 years' experience under the P. W. A. While I realize that conditions are somewhat different, essentially they are the same. In every State in the Union sponsors were glad to come in, first, with the 70-percent sponsor's contribution, accepting very gratefully the 30-percent grant made by the Federal Government in order that the desired projects might be built. Then, more recently, sponsors were even more willing and anxious to come in with their 55-percent sponsor's contribution to meet the 45-percent grant made out of the Federal Treasury. So, I say, that this experience under the P. W. A. has paved the way, and educated the people of the country, so that now there would be no serious difficulty or objection once Congress lays down some kind of standard.

Whereas the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] and others have said they oppose any kind of fixed contribution, even 5 percent, I would favor heartily a sponsor's contribution even as low as 5 percent or 10 percent. I think 25 percent ought to be the minimum, but it is the principle that appeals to me more than the amount of the contribution. I think the time has come when Congress ought to declare some legislative policy in this respect.

I believe that once a fixed ratio of contribution is established and the country realizes that this will be relaxed only upon some proof or evidence of demonstrated inability to meet the requirements, the overwhelming majority of sponsors will measure up to the test without question. Under the present system, we invite, almost compel, each community to hold out for as small a contribution as it thinks it can get by with. Every sponsor knows that the cost of projects in some States is being largely borne by W. P. A. out of the Federal Treasury. We hold out before the sponsors the bait of a big saving for local taxpayers if the effort with the W. P. A. is carried on smoothly, scientifically, and with all possible pressure. Under such circumstances, it is only human nature for a local community to do willingly just as little as possible. This is the essential vice of the present system. There will be a complete change of attitude when Congress declares its purpose to require every able sponsor, whether in Pennsylvania or Iowa, to furnish a fixed and identical portion of the cost. So I say that instead of this amendment being obnoxious because it does set up a standard, that is its real merit.

Under the present system, there is gross inequality not based on ability to pay. Hereafter, under the new procedure, there will be equal treatment to everyone, with only the exceptional cases, upon proper proof, being afforded preferential treatment.

Now the Administrator is handicapped. He is on the defensive from the start. The sponsor, knowing how little other communities have given, insists that it will contribute only so much. The Administrator has the burden of proof of establishing that the sponsor is able and ought to do more. Hereafter every sponsor will know that it must make the same contribution to support its own unemployed that is made by every other self-respecting community. It will know that, if it expects to have a project approved with a small local contribution, the burden of proof will rest on it to convince the Administrator that it is actually unable to do what is being willingly done by its neighbors and by all the rest of the country.

There is now comparatively little incentive for a local community to see that a full return is made for every dollar spent and that employables are taken off the relief rolls as rapidly as possible and returned to private employment. Require a 25-percent contribution now, and let it be understood that a still larger load is going to be placed on the local community just as fast as the General Government will permit, and we will be well on our way out of the morass in which we are now pretty well bogged down. The time is at hand it seems to me to make this start. This modest beginning will produce untold good not alone in dollars and cents, but in moral fiber and stamina.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I send to the desk a short editorial from a reliable newspaper with pronounced liberal views—the Washington Daily News—and ask that it may be read. I make this comment only, that, whereas the editorial refers specifically and by name to the Byrnes amendment, everything that is stated in the editorial applies with equal force to the now pending Robinson amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before the editorial is read?

Mr. BURKE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERTON. I understand the Senator is advocating now the Robinson amendment?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. OVERTON. I should like to inquire of him what will become, under the application of the Robinson amendment, if it should be adopted, of such projects as I shall mention.

Let us take projects which come under the classification of roadside improvements. The experience of W. P. A. in the past has been that the local contributions average 7.6 percent.

A project of that kind affords opportunity for the employment of rural labor. There might be many communities that would be able to contribute much more—they might be able to contribute 25 percent—but the local subdivision would be unwilling to make a contribution as high as 25 percent, notwithstanding it was able to do so.

There is another class of projects to which I will call the Senator's attention, for instance, parks and recreational facilities, in connection with which the local contribution has been only 8.7 percent. Also, projects with reference to sewing, canning, and so forth, where women are employed. In the case of sewing projects, the local contribution has been only 3½ percent. The Federal Government has expended on sewing projects approximately $250,000,000, and the sponsors' funds have been approximately only $9,000,000. It may be that a community would be well able to finance a sewing project but would be unwilling to contribute 25 percent.

The difficulty that I find in the application of any fixed percentage, project by project, is that there is such an infinite variety in the types of projects. Certain projects necessarily demand a much larger local contribution than other projects; and I am inquiring of the Senator what will become, if the Robinson amendment should be adopted, of the long list of projects where the local contribution is low? Are they to come within the rule of 25 percent, or are they to come within the exception to the rule?

Mr. BURKE. The Senator apparently divided projects, such as sewing projects and others, into two classes—first, those in communities which are not able to make a 25-percent contribution, or any substantial contribution, and, second, those in communities which are well able to make a 25-percent contribution but are not willing to do so. I say that a very different thing, and very properly so, would happen to those projects in communities which are not able to make the 25-percent contribution. They clearly come within the proviso of the Robinson amendment, which reads:

Provided, That if the President shall find any project to be necessary in order to provide work relief in the community where the project is to be located, and that the applicant is unable to supply 25 percent of the cost as herein required, he may authorize the project upon such contribution or assurance of contribution as he finds that the applicant is able to make.

So in all communities where the sponsors are not able to pay 25 percent, or possibly not able even to pay the 7 or 3 percent referred to, the projects can go on just the same, if they are worth while; but in other communities where the sponsors are well able to pay, and for some reason do not want to pay, the projects will not be continued, and ought not to be continued.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. The first class of projects referred to by the Senator were road projects. They are very deserving. I have in my hand a copy of an application filed by a county in my own State for a project of that character—a county which I should say has very little wealth as compared to the other counties of the State. It has a few manufacturing industries. This is a project for roads. What the sponsor is called upon to contribute is in material, in supplies, $1,806, and in equipment rentals $13,920, which makes $15,726 contribution by the county, a purely agricultural county. The contribution by the Federal Government is $48,841, its contribution being 74½ percent, and the sponsor's contribution being 24½ percent. When we take the average for the country of such projects, it is, according to Mr. Hopkins, low, because some counties have not been required even to put up 24½ percent.

With reference to the sewing projects, the contribution is only a few percent; yet, as I stated yesterday, I know that in my State, in the case of the projects designated as sewing projects, the sponsor must provide the building, the rent, the light, the water, must furnish the heat, must furnish threads and buttons, and after July 1 must furnish 25 percent of the material, the amount being estimated at approximately 37 percent. There are sewing projects that I know, which contribute 37 percent. It depends entirely upon the value of the rent; but if that is 37 percent in one instance, and in some States it is less than one-half of 1 percent, it brings down the average. The question is one of uniformity; and, as the Senator says, in each case, if the sponsor could not put up the specified amount, he would not be required to put it up, but would be allowed to do just what the sponsors are doing today, to the extent that they can.

Mr. BURKE. I thank the Senator for that suggestion.

It seems to me we have brought out one of the most vicious features of the present system; and further, in this connection, the same point was brought out very clearly at the hearings last Saturday before the Appropriations Committee by a question asked of the Administrator, Harry Hopkins, by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], which I should like to read at this point.

On page 324 of the hearings the Senator from Georgia asked Mr. Hopkins the following question:

Another thing, Mr. Hopkins. Does it not depend very largely on the viewpoint of your State administrators? That is the thing that disturbs me about it. One State administrator will take you seriously when you send down an order that sponsors must contribute to the very limit of their ability. You are dealing with human beings. I know they are all conscientious people, but another State administrator might have a wholly different idea as to what a community in another State was able to do.

Mr. HOPKINS. I grant that.

Senator RUSSELL. Therefore, where one State administrator does investigate every one of these projects very carefully, and does require the very maximum contribution from local sponsors, another one might be a little slipshod about it, and the latter community would not carry its part of the burden.

It seems to me that very point gives conclusive reason why Congress should provide in the law even this low contribution of 25 percent, even modified as it is, and made elastic as it is by giving authority to the President to modify it in any case where the sponsors cannot make their contributions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read the article which the Senator from Nebraska asks to have read from the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 14, 1937]

BETTER ORDER IN RELIEF

In Washington this week the Senate will debate and probably act on the proposed $1,500,000,000 relief appropriation.

An amendment proposed by Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, and approved by the Senate Appropriations Committee, would require local communities to put up 40 percent of the cost of W. P. A. projects started after September 30. Communities which pleaded inability to meet the requirement would be permitted to take a sort of pauper's oath and then, after an investigation of their finances, to pay as much as they could.

One of the most haphazard features of the haphazard relief program has been the so-called matching of Federal funds by the local communities. The Byrnes amendment is a step toward better order.

Originally the communities were supposed to pay planning and material costs of their W. P. A. projects, the Federal Government paying for administration and relief labor. But it hasn't worked out that way. The communities have been permitted, in effect, to write their own tickets. Some of them, backing up their pleas of poverty with political pressure, have got by with very small contributions. Last year, according to Senator BYRNES, local sponsors' contributions to W. P. A. projects ranged from one-half of 1 percent in New York City and about 7 percent in New York State to 28 percent in Idaho, and the present country-wide average is about 13 percent.

Relief Administrator Hopkins argued against the amendment and the administration will fight it, but the objections do not strike us as valid. It is true that the 40-percent figure is an arbitrary one, but any figure that might be named would be arbitrary. Nobody wants to "get tough" with the communities to the extent of denying W. P. A. aid to their unemployed. However, any community which honestly can't contribute a definitely fixed percentage of the cost of W. P. A. projects should not object to proving the facts and paying in full accordance with its ability.

Administration of relief must be made more orderly and more realistic. Adoption of the Byrnes amendment would insure keener local interest in seeing that W. P. A. money is used wisely and economically. It would provide planning and materials for better projects. And it would save a larger proportion of Federal funds to be paid, as intended, in wages to relief labor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement on the pending measure, House Joint Resolution 361, making appropriations for relief purposes. I wish to say at the outset that I am in accord with the remarks made this morning by the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. President, I have voted for every relief measure which has come before the Senate. Not only have I voted for these measures, but I have heartily encouraged them in every possible way, because we were faced with an economic emergency which called for public expenditures.

If I understand the appropriation bill before us, it provides, first, for direct relief and work relief. Second, it gives 90 days in which the W. P. A. Administrator is to select projects. Third, it applies not only to new projects, but to those already contracted for. The whole conception of the bill is that relief is a national problem. It is this, and more. Relief is a national problem and a local problem as well. It can be met in a satisfactory way only as local units of government cooperate with the Federal Government for its proper administration. Regardless of party lines we should hold strongly to the view that local units should bear some share in these responsibilities.

We have grants-in-aid used for Federal participation in highway construction, old-age assistance, mothers' aid, and other needs. When the burden of relief is placed on a more practical basis, I believe it will be through an extension of the grant-in-aid policy. States differ in their ability to provide for their local needs. Under the proposed legislation it should be possible for States showing inability to pay a stipulated percentage of relief appropriations made by the Federal Government to obtain the necessary funds upon a presentation of evidence to that effect.

For the last 2 years I have been advocating an investigation of relief and unemployment conditions so that we may know how to plan wisely for these social needs. Such a study now seems probable; steps are being taken for its organization; but it should have been instituted 2 years ago. Back in 1888 Hon. Carroll D. Wright estimated that at that time there were at least 1,000,000 people in this country who could not be counted on to provide for themselves; probably at the present time it would be safe to say that there are between three and four million people in the United States, now counted among the unemployed, who, either because of inability or lost opportunity, will never work again. Our business is to discover who they are and to make provision for them. We have long neglected this social obligation. Now we must turn to this problem, differentiate the unemployable from the unemployed, and provide for labor and industry conditions of operation which will make possible the industrial absorption of those who are fitted for work.

Mr. President, according to table 11, which shows the number and estimated cost of W. P. A. projects placed in operation through December 31, 1936, the State of Pennsylvania received 10.4 percent of the total. When one considers that approximately one-tenth of the population of the country is in this one State, 10.4 percent seems to be a reasonable allotment. There were, as of March 1937, 181,000 persons on direct relief in Pennsylvania and 192,394 on W. P. A., as of June 5, 1937. Table 11 shows that New York City has paid but one-half of 1 percent of all th money spent by the Federal Government for projects under W. P. A. in that city. I have a letter from the mayor of Philadelphia stating that Philadelphia has already arranged to pay 10 percent of the cost of all projects carried on in that city hereafter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. While I am in perfect sympathy with the position of the Senator, I feel that I must say once more that the attitude of New York State and of New York City has been misunderstood. As a matter of fact, the city and the State have contributed hundreds of millions of dollars for relief. It is unfortunate that New York is so frequently used as an example here, because the fact is that when the whole picture is seen it is discovered that both the State and the city have been very liberal. I simply speak of it to call attention to what might be a misapprehension of the kindness and charitable nature of the people of New York.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to inform the Senator from New York that I am merely quoting from table 11, showing the number and estimated cost of Works Progress Administration projects placed in operation by States, and the sources of the funds, through December 31, 1936, as published by the W. P. A. organization.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I realize that statistically it may appear that New York has not done its duty. I am not making any plea for New York; I want New York to pay its full share. But I wish to make it clear that both the State and the city of New York have been tremendously liberal, although when statistics are examined with reference to these particular projects, W. P. A. and P. W. A., it might appear to the contrary. I am not questioning the statistics to which the Senator is referring; I simply wish to have the RECORD show the facts.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, evidently there is need for a determination of a definite schedule of payments which will bring about a more just distribution of the funds. I see no reason why New York City should continue to pay but one-half of 1 percent on W. P. A. projects if the city of Philadelphia proposes to pay 10 percent. I favor a flat rate for all. I believe that 40 percent will prove to be a figure too high for the majority of local units of government. I believe 25 percent would prove to be more practical. At the same time, I wish to repeat that I know there are some places where genuine need exists which would find such a percentage absolutely impossible, and I urge that in such cases, upon presentation of the necessary evidence, the Federal Government pay a larger part of the whole so that the need may not go uncared for.

Mr. President, I listened with great attention to the reading of the editorial from the Washington News presented by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], and I ask to have printed in the RECORD, following my remarks on relief, an exact duplicate of it, being an editorial appearing in the Pittsburgh Press of Monday, June 14, 1937, entitled "Better Order in Relief."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press of June 14, 1937]

BETTER ORDER IN RELIEF

In Washington this week the Senate will debate and probably act on the proposed $1,500,000,000 relief appropriation.

An amendment proposed by Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, and approved by the Senate Appropriations Committee, would require local communities to put up 40 percent of the cost of W. P. A. projects started after September 30. Communities which pleaded inability to meet the requirement would be permitted to take a sort of pauper's oath and then, after an investigation of their finances, to pay as much as they could.

One of the most haphazard features of the haphazard relief program has been the so-called matching of Federal funds by the local communities. The Byrnes amendment is a step toward better order.

Originally the communities were supposed to pay planning and material costs of their W. P. A. projects, the Federal Government paying for administration and relief labor. But it hasn't worked out that way. The communities have been permitted, in effect, to write their own tickets. Some of them, backing up their pleas of poverty with political pressure, have got by with very small contributions. Last year, according to Senator BYRNES, local sponsors' contributions to W. P. A. projects ranged from one-half of 1 percent in New York City and about 7 percent in New York State to 28 percent in Idaho, and the present country-wide average is about 13 percent.

Relief Administrator Hopkins argued against the amendment and the administration will fight it, but the objections do not strike us as valid. It is true that the 40-percent figure is an arbitrary one, but any figure that might be named would be arbitrary. Nobody wants to "get tough" with the communities to the extent of denying W. P. A. aid to their unemployed. However, any community which honestly can't contribute a definitely fixed percentage of the cost of W. P. A. projects should not object to proving the facts and paying in full accordance with its ability.

Administration of relief must be made more orderly and more realistic. Adoption of the Byrnes amendment would insure keener local interest in seeing that W. P. A. money is used wisely and economically. It would provide planning and materials for better projects. And it would save a larger proportion of Federal funds to be paid, as intended, in wages to relief labor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in the discussion that we have been indulging in on House Joint Resolution 361, the pending relief resolution, I think the field has been so thoroughly canvassed and the facts so thoroughly explored that it would be a work of supererogation to go over any part of this field again. I merely want very briefly to voice my opposition to the committee amendment and to the other amendments which have been suggested, because I am definitely in opposition to requiring local communities to contribute to W. P. A. relief funds.

The arguments of the past 2 days revolving around the committee amendment which would require the States and local communities to contribute up to 40 percent of the cost of W. P. A. projects has taken such a wide range and has contained so much material regarding the conditions existing in the various communities of the country that, I repeat, I refrain from going over that ground, because so much has been said about the dire needs of these communities that I think we ought to have established that fact without doubt.

The problem we confront challenges the statesmanship of the country. It does not seem possible to proceed much further in our congressional labors without dealing very purposefully and realistically with causes as well as effects. It has seemed to me at times that all of our efforts have been given over to a consideration of effects growing out of the operations of our economic system, and because of the serious and challenging aspect of these effects we have not found time honestly to appraise the nature of our economic machine. It is certainly the part of wisdom and statesmanship to examine the operations of the machinery of production in this country with a view of ascertaining with all the accuracy possible what effect this machine is having on the problem of poverty and unemployment.

It has seemed futile to me to talk about the number of jobs available when so many of these jobs may last for 1 hour or 1 day or 1 week and no longer. To dignify such casual employment as a "job" is to make a ghastly joke of the miseries of the man who is compelled to rely on such "jobs" for a livelihood and for the support of his family. When we speak of jobs I want to think of them in terms of permanency, and I hope that everyone else in the Congress of the United States holds the same view.

It is because permanency in employment is so vital and the lack of it so deadly to our economy and to the welfare of our workers that we cannot, in justice to ourselves and to the people we represent, refrain very much longer in making an accurate appraisement of exactly what our economic system is doing to our people with respect to furnishing permanent jobs to them, or by its operations literally withholding jobs from them.

In presenting the figures I am going to employ, I want it understood that I do not use them for the purpose of challenging the decency and sense of justice of any man in this country, although our economic machinery is so geared that it is now doing a very cruel thing to the people. The fact that it may not be a studied or purposeful cruelty makes no difference—if economic misery and financial despair are visited upon a people the practical effect is the same whether it be done deliberately or merely through the operation of a coldly impersonal economic machine.

The amendment proposed by the committee to this bill, which would compel communities to make a very substantial contribution to the Federal relief program, is a very dangerous one. We in the Congress are in a position to tax large incomes. The State problem of taxation is largely one of ad-valorem taxes on the property of the people and these taxes have now reached the point where defaults in collection have become notorious. It is no answer to say that vast incomes escape in no small part the burden of Federal income taxes, and our tax experts can readily find for us the answer to that problem. We can and should close the loopholes.

As a part of my argument against the suggestion that a definite part of this Federal relief program be shifted arbitrarily in whole or in part to local communities, I want to call attention to what has happened in our industrial life since 1920. The figures I am going to use deal with the problem of wages, production costs, and industrial output. They are taken from the most authoritative sources available. I do not assert that they are absolutely accurate, but they are the best data available and have been compiled by thoughtful and intelligent men, intellectually equipped to do the work, and so far as all the records indicate these men are void of any desire to overstress any facts or to give us a false picture. I have not gone back of 1920, which seems but such a short time ago, to secure data to emphasize the seriousness of the problem we confront.

These figures show that year by year a smaller number of human beings employed in industry are able to produce more each year than was produced before. The figures show that wages have recently been forced up for those engaged in industry and that along with wage increases has come a terrific increase in the productivity of the workers, and the results of their labor are referred to as the "output per man-hour" or "per man-year" in the studies that have been made.

It is obvious that if fewer human beings are able to produce more each year with the aid of modern machinery, and this process continues, the problem that confronts us will become intensified and we will never be able to divorce ourselves from the ghastly anomaly of desperate poverty for millions in the midst of the greatest productivity the Nation has ever witnessed. The picture is not only bewildering—it is also one of deadly menace to the people's happiness and prosperity. It is not my desire to discuss at this time the remedy which, in my judgment, must be applied to meet this challenge. It seems obvious, however, that the only agency to which the people may look for relief and guidance—the Federal Government and the Congress—must seriously consider the necessity of shortening the labor period so that our industrial machine can absorb those who are willing and able to work and adjust wage levels so that these people will be able to buy back what this industrial machine is producing. If we do not do this I believe we are heading for trouble which will be infinitely worse than our present difficulties, and the continuance of this condition will destroy our economic machine.

The figures I am using seem to be a challenge to those who believe in preserving our present economic order. If we choose to ignore the implications of this picture and they are able to convince Congress that it is a mistake to adopt such a program as I have suggested, then we will merely postpone the day of reckoning. I want to continue generous relief efforts, but I want the Congress also to drive straight at this problem of technological change. I think true statesmanship calls for this prompt and direct approach. History is replete with instances of stubborn opposition to change, and the apostles of laissez faire have closed their eyes to the fact that change is the law of life, that society is not a static thing, and the ultraconservatives of our time, in so many instances, close their eyes to the fact that science is making over industrial society and thrusting upon us the terrifying problem growing out of an incredible productivity going hand in hand with want and uncertainty, which is the everyday problem of millions of Americans.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a chart prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board. It contains a showing which in itself constitutes it as one of the major and outstanding answers to the enigma which confronts us. Day by day we ask ourselves why it is that, with production nearing predepression levels and with wages going higher in certain industries, we have this unemployment problem; and the answer comes now from this agency which in my judgment is qualified to make the answer.

There are three or four outstanding statistical agencies or investigatory bodies in this country which are well qualified to make the studies that are so vital and so essential to an intelligent understanding of the problem and an intelligent approach to its solution. We postpone dealing with this question at our peril. We should either walk up like men and meet the problem, or we shall suffer the inevitable crash that is coming.

Mr. President, this chart is a study covering a period of from 1914 to 1937, including the first 3 months of 1937. It shows that in 1914 the Board adopted an index figure of 100 for the factor of production per man-hour in American industry.

Production per man-hour in American industry did not rise perceptibly up to 1919. Beginning in that year there was a very sharp rise in production per man-hour in our manufacturing industries. From 1919 to 1937 the production per man-hour in American manufacturing industries rose from approximately 100 units of production to 192 units of production per man-hour, representing an increase of approximately 92 percent, less the slight difference of increase between 1914 and 1919, which, indeed, was very slight.

Now let us see what happened to the man-hours of labor in that period; that is to say, the man-hours of labor required to increase production from an index figure of around 100 to an index figure of 192; or, to put it in another way, from a production of 100 units per man-hour to a production of 192 units per man-hour. The index figure of the man-hours of labor required to accomplish that tremendous step-up and increase in the tempo of production was around 120 in 1920, and from that point it dropped to around 90 in the year 1921, pursuing after that a rather devious course and winding up in 1937 with an index figure of 92. The 1937 index figure of production per man-hour is 192; the 1937 index figure of man-hours is 92—100 less. There, in its heart and in its essence, is the real reason for much of our trouble. We have a startling picture of fewer and fewer men turning out more and more products in the industrial life of America. Coupled with that we face the hard, cold fact that there is a definite employment deadline set up in American industry, somewhere around the age of 40. American industry is demanding and hiring only the best physically and intellectually among young American workers, and is ready to discharge them when they reach 40 years of age. Gray hairs have literally become a badge of dishonor in our American industrial economy.

Along with this has gone a rapid step-up in wages per man-hour in American industry. I am going to give the Senate some figures on that point which I have taken from a number of sources, all of which I believe to be very accurate. I present some figures from the Alexander Hamilton Institute, which, in my judgment, is a very reliable organization which does much work in the field of research. The Alexander Hamilton Institute sets forth the fact that the cost of labor, that is to say, the complete overhead cost of labor, in our industrial life was relatively low at the beginning of 1937, and this is in striking contrast to the general impression created by the announcement of general increases in wage rates. In other words, while we had a very marked increase in wage rates, the total overhead, the over-all cost of labor in industry in this country which produced this tremendous outpouring from our industrial life, which rose to the index figure of 192 in the first quarter of this year—the over-all cost of labor was relatively low.

But the cost of labor depends not only on wage rates but on the productivity per man-hour. If this were not so, the cost of labor in January 1937 would seem exceptionally high. Our wage rates in January 1937—that is, wage per man-hour in American industry—were the highest reached in the depression, and these rates exceeded those of 1920 during the great inflationary period.

Now let us consider for a moment the output per man-hour through the eyes of the experts of the Alexander Hamilton Institute. That institute says this about the output per man-hour:

> In January 1937 the output per man-hour was 1½ percent higher than in 1936; it was 16.7 percent higher than in 1929; it was 71.2 percent higher than in 1920.

This explains why the cost of labor, that is, the overhead cost of labor to American industry in January 1937, was 12½ percent lower than in 1929 and 40.9 percent lower than in 1920, and all this decrease in labor cost occurred in face of the fact that wage rates are now apparently the highest on record in any of our industries.

I am going to employ some figures from the Brookings Institution and other organizations, namely, the A. F. of L., the President's Committee on Economic Security, and National Industrial Conference Board. A composite of these figures, I think, gives a fair approximation of the real facts. I know of no other sources of information to which we can go and be assured that we may rest our conclusions on anything like the real truth. Certainly, without further enlightenment, without other sources of information that we know to be more accurate, the Congress of the United States may well rely upon the intellectual integrity of these groups.

In its work, The Recovery Problem in the United States, the Brookings Institution, in the volume issued in 1936, has this to say:

> Before we leave the discussion of the employment situation and manufacturing it is significant to note that since the World War there has been a marked tendency toward contraction in the volume of employment furnished by manufacturing. Despite the increase in population, the number of wage earners in 1929 was lower than in 1919.

No wonder we were entering a panic!

> The decrease cannot be explained by cyclical differences in economic activity between the 2 years, for the 1929 manufacturing production was the highest ever attained, and was, in fact, almost 50 percent higher than in 1919.

Yet the number of wage earners in 1929 was less than in 1919.

I suggest to the Members of the Senate that we may no more disregard the ruthless implications of these figures than we can snub a cyclone or refuse an introduction to a buzz saw going a million revolutions a minute if we fall into it.

Imagine a production of 50 percent higher in 1929 than in 1919 and yet requiring fewer men to attain that degree of production. We are now finding the cause of the thing we grapple with here today, and that is why I bring it to the attention of the Senate. We are dealing with effects and not causes when we pay out money to take care of victims of this sort of a situation, and, so long as we disregard, or appear to disregard, the cause and do not drive right into it, we are going to pay a sad price some time in the not too distant future. That is why I was so much interested in the proposal back in 1933 of the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who I think coldly, dispassionately, objectively headed into this problem by his 30-hour-week bill.

I believe that hours of labor in this country must be shortened, and the only way we can accomplish that is by the legislative power of Government, which, in a democracy, is the only intelligent weapon that the people can employ. Shorten the hours of labor for industry, reemploy and reabsorb those who are willing and able to work and are really employable, and let the wage levels after that be made sufficient to enable workers to buy what this industrial machine of ours is producing. If we continue to ignore that sort of program, no matter how great the impulse certain gentlemen have in their hearts to preserve and make worth while this economic system of ours, it will fall out from beneath us some day.

Let us go ahead with the Brookings Institution, which has something further to say on this subject:

> Unemployment has decreased considerably since the bottom of the depression. Nonetheless, the number unemployed in 1936 may still be placed between 9,000,000 and 10,000,000—some 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 more than in 1929. Underemployment on account of short hours would raise these estimates.

I am not asserting that that which is suggested by the Brookings Institute as an accurate statement of unemployment. Nevertheless it comes from an organization which I think is characterized by intellectual honesty in its factual statements, whether we agree with its conclusions or not.

On June 16 the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] talked about the number of jobs and the number of Americans employed. I know literally hundreds of men who have had employment, but for how long? A week, 2 days, a month, 2 months, and then out again. Is there any man who calls that employment? Is there a man in the Senate who thinks that this is real employment; that it affords security? Yet that is the sort of job that has been referred to here as a real job for an American. Such a suggestion outrages one's sense of decency, let along common justice.

How many men are unemployed God only knows, but manifestly there is a vast army of men and women in the country still unemployed; and what I am discussing now, this step-up in the tempo of production, makes inevitable that a still greater army will continue to be unemployed.

I think Mr. Hopkins was accurate in his statement before the Senate committee when he pointed out that 500,000 more workers seek employment in the United States every year. That means that since 1929, and right in the face of the depression and in the face of the ability of industry to turn out more and more units with fewer and fewer men and fewer and fewer hours, we must face the fact of this accretion of 500,000 new workers in America every year. Has there been much discussion about it? The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and some others have talked about it, and yet that in itself is the very heart, the very soul, the very essence of the problem of unemployment and relief.

The Brookings Institution, in its book, The Recovery Problem in the United States, at page 164, states that "the fitted trend shows that productivity per equivalent full-time wage earner in manufacturing increased at the rate of 4 percent per annum", these figures referring to the period from 1919 to 1935, which would be an increase over 1919 of 64 percent. They make some slight adjustments later by pointing out that a full correction of their calculations might slightly change this result when salary workers and proprietors and firm members are included in the figure. Nevertheless, that would still leave it at 3½ percent a year.

The Monthly Survey of Business of the American Federation of Labor of May 11, 1937, points out that—

> A most recent study of the United States Labor Department shows that the general level of production and services must rise 20 percent above 1929 before unemployment can be reduced to the 1929 figure; the increase in population and gain in productivity makes this necessary. Production cannot reach this level unless workers' buying power brings it there.

That is a quotation from the Monthly Survey of the American Federation of Labor. On page 88 of the Brookings Institution report the author of that volume has this to say:

> Many observers have pointed to the persistence of an extraordinary volume of unemployment as perhaps the most outstanding characteristic of the present recovery movement. It is contended that this reflects continued technological improvement as well as the growth of population.

In the President's message of January 11, 1937, he pointed out the possibility of gradual increase in unemployment because of increased population. That statement was as follows:

> As a result of the natural increase in our population, each year at least 400,000 new workers are seeking work, and this number of new jobs annually is necessary simply to prevent an increase in unemployment.

I do not think anyone will seriously challenge the President's conclusions. In other words, we have to provide not alone for our unemployed, but for at least 400,000 new jobs each year in order even to maintain the status quo, and on top of that we find this tremendous step-up in production which is in itself shoving men out of industrial life. No wonder there is a deadline around the age of 40. We have all these evil factors, not due to the inherent viciousness of men, but to the inevitable economic drift, the evolutionary drift in business. It is the outgrowth of scientific achievement. These factors all conspire to make this problem increasingly harder to solve.

From the Library of Congress I have obtained a copy of the Monthly Labor Review of April of this year in which is presented an index of man-hour output. In using these figures I am merely trying to give a cross section of opinion from these different organizations which have attempted to go into the subject and give us the truth concerning it.

Using the index figure of 100 as the man-hour output for 1932, we find that the man-hour output figure rose to 111 in 1933, dropped to 108 in 1934, rose to 113 in 1935 and to 117 in January 1937. These figures seem to indicate the productivity increase of approximately 4 percent a year, to which I have previously referred.

It is also challenging to note that men who formerly had been employed in manufacturing and mechanical industries, and in mining, report the longest periods of unemployment. It is in manufacturing and mining and fields of that character where we find the greatest introduction of so-called labor-saving machinery in recent years. I will give a practical illustration of this.

I see in front of me the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]. In Indiana the Ball glass works is an example of the thing about which I am speaking. I expect the junior Senator from Indiana would not accuse Mr. Ball—and neither would I accuse Mr. Ball—of being a bad citizen for introducing labor-saving machinery into his factory. He does it because it is part and parcel of the impulse of businessmen to reduce their operating overhead. Nevertheless, it is something with which we as legislators must grapple because we are spending money to take care of the products of that sort of operation.

A few days ago I talked to a man coming from my own home. He was interested in a certain lumber operation in the State of Washington. They had 21 men employed in that operation. A man came out from Chicago and talked about a machine which could be introduced into that plant, and sold the company on the idea of installing the machine so that 9 men could turn out what the 21 men they had employed had previously turned out. They put in the machine. They are now employing 9 of my fellow citizens, who are turning out as much as 21 did before. What are those poor follows who went out of that plant going to do? If they walk over to another plant doing similar work, they find that the employer there has probably been compelled to put in the same kind of a machine in order to compete with the man who had just removed them from his employment because he no longer needed their services.

In high-line logging operations in the State of Washington years ago we used to be able to occupy the time of a great army of men. Today we find a little handful of men is employed in the Washington woods, using great donkey engines with their enormous power, with great cables strung up the side of the mountain, where trees a hundred feet long or more are snaked down the side of the mountain, stripping little trees out of the way, and loading the large trees or logs on the cars by machinery. The result is that the army of men that used to be in the logging business in the State of Washington are no longer there. Western Senators know that the picture I paint is true.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. MINTON. If the employee to whom the Senator referred a moment ago, who lost his job to a machine, should go over to a competitor who perhaps had not installed the machine, or to anyone who was not a competitor, and should seek a job, and the employee happened to be 45 years of age or more, he probably would have a difficult time getting a job, would he not?

Mr. BONE. Yes; that is so tragically true.

Mr. MINTON. And do we not find included among the persons we are trying to take care of under this program numbers of men who have reached the age of 45 and upward, and who are the victims of that kind of discrimination by their former employers at this time?

Mr. BONE. That is true. I know that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], in his own experience in his own home, has had this supreme social tragedy brought to his attention many times. I wonder if there is a man in this body who has not repeatedly had some poor fellow almost cry in his office because he could not get a job. Nobody wanted him. He had reached the tragic age of 40 or 45. He was no longer quite as vigorous as he had been. He was compelled to go about crying "Unclean"—a sort of a pariah in our industrial world.

No wonder we have a demand that we provide some sort of a pension system, so that at the age of 60 or 65, men who are the helpless victims of this sort of an operation can remove themselves from the necessity of trying to find a place in our industrial treadmills. Now they are denied even that poor privilege through no fault of their own.

Is there an answer to the problem created by figures I have given? If we need approximately half a million new jobs every year to take care of the boys and girls who are coming out of school, and industry in America has so stepped up the tempo of production per man-hour that since 1919 it has risen approximately 90 percent, how in the world are we ever going to solve this problem, Members of the Senate, unless we adopt some such formula as that suggested by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]? I have not heard anything offered as an alternative that will reach this matter. Every man in this body knows that we cannot find an honest solution in merely offering relief. We could continue it, perhaps, but it does not answer.

If the thing I have suggested is not the answer—that is, that we must shorten hours arbitrarily in this country, and maintain wage-levels at a point that will enable these men to buy back what the capitalist machine in this country is producing, then where can we find the answer?

Do we intend to preserve the capitalist machine? I sometimes find myself wondering whether some of the most ardent defenders of capitalism are really its friends. If they continue to resist the program I have suggested they thereby preserve these germs of dissolution in the body social. We are going to have it on the operating table before many years go by; and it is going to be a major operation, Senators.

Now, I desire to advert for a moment to the statement of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] that we now have millions of jobs in the United States. If that is the case, an extraordinary thing has occurred since last year, because the three agencies of research I have mentioned say that in 1936 we still had a vast army of unemployed. For instance, the American Federation of Labor claimed that there were 11,000,000 unemployed in 1936. The President's Council on Economic Security said that there were approximately nine and one-half million. The National Industrial Conference Board reached the same conclusion—that is, about nine and one-half million. It is obvious either that these three groups are entirely wrong, or that the inference which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] sought to leave in argument is wholly erroneous; for I gathered from what he said that there were comparatively few unemployed in this country today.

If that be true, then the most astounding thing in all human history has occurred. Anywhere from 9,000,000 to 11,000,000 Americans have gone back to work within a period of 1 year. That, I really feel, is too astounding a thing to have ever occurred in this country. We know it has not occurred.

The Brookings Institution goes on further to say:

> Before we leave the discussion of the unemployment situation in manufacturing it is significant to note that since the World War there has been a marked tendency toward contraction in the volume of unemployment furnished by manufacturing.

Do you see how gently, how even chastely, carefully, and conservatively the Brookings concern approaches this problem? A great deal of restraint is evidenced in its statements.

> Despite the increase in population, the number of wage earners in 1929 was lower than in 1919.

Again, a repetition of what I have previously stated.

> The decrease cannot be explained by cyclical differences in economic activity between the 2 years, for in 1929 manufacturing production was the highest ever obtained, and was, in fact, almost 50 percent higher than in 1919.

I have repeated this as coming from the Brookings people, because I do not believe anyone here will challenge the Brookings Institution.

I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate any longer except for some observations on the joint resolution, because my State, in common with many other States, is very vitally interested in it. All the Western States are. There has been so much discussion here of the State of New York that I think it has had a tendency to obscure the real truth. I look at the matter coldly and objectively. I come from a State clear across the United States from New York. I can realize, as I think we all do, that New York has within its borders almost 10 percent of the population of this country. If New York received somewhere around 10 percent of the relief money, I should consider that nothing astounding or outrageous.

I know that New York City is a city filled with millions of poor. I know that the relief program was predicated on the theory that we would apply money where needs existed. If the needs are in New York, I cannot bring myself to complain. I know that New York State has not been the beneficiary of large farm allotments, as many States have. The western sections of the country and other sections of the country have received generous farm allotments under the farm-relief program; but New York probably has not, with its farming in a somewhat different category.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator will recall that during the debate it was developed that New York had received what looked like a disproportionate share of the funds from the W. P. A., and that South Carolina had received $23,000,000 from the A. A. A., while New York had received a paltry few thousand dollars, perhaps $100,000, which only goes to show what the Senator has just been pointing out—that New York has the densest population, the most industrial population, and therefore has the most unemployed, and gets most of the money for unemployed relief. South Carolina has cotton, and gets the A. A. A. taxes.

Mr. BONE. That is correct. The Senator from Indiana is absolutely right. Every Senator in this body knows the nature of work in New York City—miles of lofts, vast numbers of manufacturing institutions that are a part and parcel of the whole picture of labor-saving machinery. Chicago is in the same boat. These great, big cities are literally hives of industry; and, of course, when there is a slump in the market the workers in these factories are among the first ones hit. When machinery goes in they are among the first ones to lay their necks on the industrial chopping block.

I am not here to defend New York. I shall not waste any time on New York; but I know that when labor-saving machinery comes into the field New York is going to feel it, because New York is so thoroughly industrialized. It is one gigantic beehive, and, of course, they feel the effect of a slump probably before some other sections of the country feel it.

The fact that the South has not spent so much local money on relief is not an astounding thing to anybody who has traveled through the South, because I think they are frequently rather backward in recognition of such needs. I do not want to wound the sensibilities of my southern brethren here. I live out West, and we view those things quite differently than some of our southern brethren.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that Tennessee paid 26.6 percent—the largest except two.

Mr. BONE. I have been through some sections of the South, and I am frank to say that I have been terribly depressed by the evidences of terrible poverty which would not be permitted to exist out in my country. I do not know just why. It gives me something of a thrill to live in a country where the people would not placidly accept it.

I think if this amendment is adopted, Senators, a great many things are going to suffer. There has been some allusion here to "white collar" projects; and, really, one of the supreme tragedies of this whole situation—I know all Senators realize that, because they have had it brought so forcefully to their attention—one of the supreme tragedies of this whole picture has been the tragedy that overwhelmed the "white collar" groups.

I hold no particular brief for any group in society; but I do say that no more poignant misery can come to any human being than that which comes to an educated man who has tripped on life's rough financial pathway and plunged into a shoreless sea of poverty—and there is no life preserver for him. The "white collar" projects and educational and youth projects have been a godsend to such men. I have the feeling—I do not know whether or not I am right; the Members of the Senate will have to pass judgment on that—I just have the instinctive feeling that when the pinch comes, a great many of those men are going to suffer, because the communities will not readily put up money for them.

Take the case of women's projects. Senators know the impulse to say, "Oh, well, what do we care about this? It is just a sewing or clerical job of some sort, and we are going to have a lot of clerks and women running around here doing nothing and drawing funds out of the Public Treasury", whereas in the hearts of those people there is a wretchedness and a misery impossible to describe. Their miseries are overwhelming to them. I believe that we are doing a frightful injustice in acting on this bill if we rob those people of the one chance they have for relief.

We are told, finally, that we must not put this burden of taxes on future generations, that we are in prosperous times now, and that we must get out from under the present burden by cutting these people off.

If the figures I have used indicate that we are in a prosperous condition, I am frank to say that I do not know the real meaning of the term. We are not in a prosperous condition in this country when millions of men cannot get jobs. If such a condition is prosperity, look you to see assaults on this economic order of ours the like of which you have not yet witnessed. If that be our conception of justice, we are heading into more grievous trouble.

Of what avail is it for three-fourths of the people to have jobs if one-fourth cannot get work and cannot know the meaning of economic security? Is it our privilege as a legislative body to disregard that sort of condition? Is that the part of statesmanship, or is it our idea of loyalty to idealism? Is that the New Deal we so solemnly promised the American people? I thought the New Deal meant that we would do battle like Trojans to establish high standards of economic justice. Our promises become empty phrases when one-fourth of the population in this country is out in the cold. No group in this country should be dispossessed and be compelled to make a losing fight for that thing which is so much a part of our American idealism now, our American tradition, that is economic justice for all.

I hope we will vote down these committee amendments, and the amendment of my good friend, the Senator from Arkansas. Let us carry the relief load until we have set our faces resolutely to the eastward on the pathway toward a real solution of the economic problem which is shortened hours, more wages, so that American industry for the first time shall establish itself on a real basis of economic security for all the people.

Mr. BONE subsequently said: Mr. President, while I was addressing the Senate earlier in the day I referred to a graph, which I wish to have printed as a part of my remarks. It is a very small one. At this time I ask unanimous consent that the graph may be printed as part of my remarks. I am uncertain as to whether or not under the rules it can be printed in the RECORD, but it is so very small I think possibly it could get by. The graph deals with the production of man-hours, 1914 to 1937.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised it is necessary to get the consent of the Joint Committee on Printing before it can be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BONE. Should I send the graph to the desk and ask that consent be given by the Joint Committee on Printing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber for a moment. What is the request?

Mr. BONE. I wish to have this little chart published as part of my remarks. It is very small.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to it. I do not know what the printing rule applicable to the subject is, but so far as I am concerned I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is my impression that under the rules the Senator from Washington will have to get permission from the Joint Committee on Printing, in order to have the graph printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BONE. My question was whether I had to seek such consent. I merely wish to make the graph a part of the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. There is no question that the consent will be granted, but I have the impression that the rules require that request be made of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. BONE. I should like to have my request follow my remarks. I shall ask that it be passed upon by the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. WALSH. I think an illustration of any kind must be submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing, and that committee must consent to it being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BONE. Will the Senator advise me whether my request made at this time will be communicated to the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, Mr. President, and action will be taken by that committee. The matter in question does not have to be printed in today's RECORD, does it?

Mr. BONE. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

Mr. WALSH. It is quite possible to have a meeting of the committee very shortly after the conclusion of today's session.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hesitate somewhat to try to make any contribution to this debate after listening to the very able discussion that has proceeded in this Chamber for the last 2 or 3 days. Yet I feel as though there are some principles involved in the pending amendment which deserve very careful consideration in the light of the condition which confronts the country, and which has confronted it since 1933, and even prior to that year. Previous to that time, when a section of the country was afflicted with disaster, the local communities took care of their unfortunate and needy. Occasionally a terrible catastrophe occurred which was of such magnitude that the National Government stepped in and gave some relief. We had never had such an experience as has befallen us since the terrible depression began. At first the communities, the States, the counties, the municipalities took care of their needy until they exhausted all their funds.

The depression continued year after year. It would be interesting to discuss and consider its causes, but for the purpose of the particular amendment now pending that is unnecessary. Everybody knows what the depression did and what it is doing now. Naturally everyone expected a local community to take care of its needy if it was able to do so. But, so far as I know, there has never been a time in the history of the country when a community was not able to take care of its suffering members that some organization higher up did not step in and help it.

Mr. President, that is the way our Nation got into this relief problem. Here was a depression, a catastrophe greater than any the world had ever experienced. The local community, the county, the municipality, the State, exhausted its resources, and still the depression continued.

Would it help those suffering to say here on the floor of the Senate, "The Nation is not concerned with these local problems. Let every community take care of its suffering members as it has done in the past"; and everybody would be glad to have them do it if they could. But when you ask a starving man who has not a penny to make a contribution of 10 cents, so that you may add to it and make it 50 cents, you might just as well say, "You must contribute a million." If he has not the money, he can make no contribution. When the community exhausted its means and was at the end of its resources it could do nothing more.

Gradually it dawned on the people of this country and upon Congress that the depression was greater than anyone had anticipated it would be; it lasted longer than anybody had anticipated it would last; and we had to come to the succor of the communities and the cities and the States and the counties in the Nation.

I am not interested in whether the national relief movement originated on this side of the aisle or on the other side; I am not interested in what party first started to give national relief. When a person is suffering and dying in California, it is to California that we ought to go if California cannot take care of the needy in that State, and alleviate human suffering. If it is in Florida, we should go there.

The depression did not take account of State lines. It gradually spread over the entire country. Some parts of the country, as everyone knows, suffered more than others. In some places the people needed more succor, they needed more relief. It is not for me to say that my State, for instance, should not help to contribute to the suffering and the needy in a distant State simply because they live in a different locality. As I see it, State lines have nothing to do with the matter. It is, as it has been all along, a question of human need. Gradually the National Government got into this work to save from death those who were starving and suffering.

Mr. President, in the beginning it looked as though our civilization was standing on the brink of destruction. It so seemed to me many times. I could hardly see a way open by which we could escape. The conditions in our country could be met only by the National Government.

If we should provide, as this amendment does, that in order for a local community to get a local project of work relief it must make a contribution of 40 percent, or 25 percent, or any other percentage, we would be imposing a condition it would be absolutely impossible to meet, and we would be bearing down heaviest on those who were suffering the most.

It was argued here the other day, truthfully and ably, that conditions are growing better, that we are gradually coming out of the depression, that the price of corn is higher, that the price of hogs is higher, that the price of wheat is higher. But in some places in this country, covering large sections, are wheat farmers, for instance, who have not produced any wheat for 3 or 4 and in some cases 5 years. Their money is all gone. They now have no wheat. The higher price of wheat does not mean anything to a farmer so situated except that it somewhat increases his cost of living.

The price of hogs is higher, said a Senator yesterday; but that does not mean any profit to a man if he has not any hogs. The same statement applies to cattle. There are sections of this country suffering from the terrible world-wide depression which, in addition, have suffered from drought, a scourge as great as the depression itself.

In those sections farmers who have not produced any crops for several years have seen their crops burned up by hot winds, their cattle die from starvation, their children, dressed in rags, suffering and crying for food. High prices for wheat and high prices for hogs do not bring them relief. We cannot ask them to make a contribution of 25 percent or 10 percent or 5 percent. They have passed the contribution stage. Those are the people who are suffering most keenly today.

Mr. President, it seems to me it is not wise for the Federal Government now to say to those people, "Before you can get any Federal money you must make a contribution" of any percent or of any amount. They cannot do it; it is impossible for them to do it. So it seems to me this amendment, which I concede was offered in good faith, ought to be defeated, no matter what the percentage provided by it may be.

Senators have had a great deal to say about balancing the Budget. We have heard that demand for years. I should like to see the Budget balanced; I realize the desirability of balancing the Budget, and I realize that we cannot permanently go on without a balanced Budget; but I would rather see the Budget unbalanced than to see millions of little children suffering for lack of food. I would rather have an unbalanced Budget if by means of an unbalanced Budget I could bring relief to millions of stricken people all over the country. It would be easy to balance the Budget. It is not a difficult thing, so far as Congress is concerned, to balance the Budget; but it would mean that we would give no relief where relief must be afforded in order to sustain human life.

If Congress makes no contribution to relief, if we appropriate no money, we shall soon be able to balance the Budget. A balanced Budget is desirable. The situation of the Government is the same as that of the individual, the businessman, the farmer, the professional man. All want to balance their various budgets, and their budgets sometimes become unbalanced through no fault of theirs. They are not to blame when some misfortune occurs which compels them to unbalance their budget, and it remains unbalanced until the difficulty is surmounted; and if it is not surmounted, of course ruin comes in the end. If we had done nothing in the way of making contributions for the suffering and the needy, I think our country would today be numbered among the nations that are dead.

Mr. President, those who say we ought to balance the Budget at all hazards remind me of the farmer living in the drought-stricken section of the West who suffered not only from the depression but from the drought. His wife was taken suddenly ill, and the doctor said that in order to save her life it was necessary that she be taken to a distant city, to a certain hospital, to be operated upon by an expert surgeon. The farmer had raised no crops that year, but he had a home, and had a farm clear of debt. He was out of debt, but that particular year he had not added to his surplus. In fact, his budget then was probably slightly out of balance.

On bended knees, beside the bed of his dying wife, he said, "My dear wife, we have gone along together for 50 years. We settled in this country when it was a barren waste. We had no money to start with. We mortgaged our farm. We struggled along, you and I together. We have paid our taxes, we have paid our debts, we have paid off our mortgage, and here together we enjoy the fruits of our joint labors. You helped as much as I, and to you there should be as much credit given as to me. I love you, my dear wife, as I love my own life; but if I take you across the country to this hospital to save your life it will unbalance my budget. If you will hang onto life by the slender thread for another year, and if God sends the rain and I can produce a crop so that I shall not need to unbalance my budget, I will take you to the hospital."

Mr. President, it is somewhat that way with our country. Uncle Sam is sick. He is recovering slowly—not so fast as we wanted him to, not so rapidly as we hoped he would—but he is getting better. He is getting well. Now, we will discharge the doctor before he is well. He will start on a new method of treatment. We will make him contribute something to the doctor the next time the doctor comes, whether he has any money or not, and if he does not contribute we will tell the doctor to stay away.

Mr. President, I think it is unwise now to take this proposed step. It seems to me we cannot afford to do it. Those whom we want to relieve, those who are in the direst distress, will be the ones upon whom we would place the greatest burden—a burden which, in my judgment, is absolutely impossible to be carried.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, it has been stated in the course of the debate, and properly stated, that the question of relief is a national problem. I know that to be correct, because the Congress has acted upon that theory and has adopted that philosophy in all the relief laws which have been enacted to date. I do not believe that relief can be administered throughout the Nation upon any mathematical formula or upon any fixed percentage basis, and I do not believe that it should be administered upon merely geographical lines or according to State boundaries. If from one end of the land to the other people are suffering and are in need or unemployed, then relief must be free to disregard State boundaries, percentages, and any other kind of arbitrary limitation, and reach out to those who are in need. The great diversity of interests and of conditions throughout the country make that absolutely necessary.

If we should adopt any fixed standard of percentages in this joint resolution, it would be impossible of administration, because on the 40-percent basis which has been suggested not a single State in the Union could qualify for relief money. It would, therefore, be senseless to put a provision in this measure requiring a 40-percent contribution from the sponsors when the sponsors simply could not comply with the condition.

I know that there is a provision to the effect that if the President, after making investigation of the financial status and condition of the various cities and communities which may sponsor projects, finds that they are unable to provide the 40 percent required, he may mitigate the blow and make the percentage less. But of what value is that, Mr. President, when the time absorbed in making the necessary investigation, considering the "red tape" activities which would inevitably follow the proper discharge of any such responsibility on the part of the President, might leave thousands of people suffering while the investigations were being made and before any relief could actually be had?

Now, let us consider the 25-percent limitation. According to the figures of last year, furnished by Mr. Hopkins—and I will refer to them in a moment from the record I have here—only 12 States in the Union could qualify under the 25-percent limitation. I need not mention those States, because I do not want to seem to be drawing invidious comparisons between the States. I only mention it as a fact, which should not be disregarded when we come to vote upon the question of even the 25-percent limitation in the pending joint resolution.

I refer to table 42, on page 246, in the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropirations of the House of Representatives on the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1937. There will be found a corroboration of what I have just said, that only 12 States of the American Union could qualify under the 25-percent provision if such a percentage were to be exacted as an absolute condition. The average of contributions by local sponsors in all the States is only 24.4 percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The average contributions of all States was 13.1 percent.

Mr. McADOO. The figures in this table show differently. The statement is, "State and local funds, 24.4 percent in the United States."

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to point out as to the difference between the two figures that the same difference arose between the figures the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] submitted and those submitted by me. The figures which the Senator is reading are figures covering all relief, direct and work relief both, while the figures to which the Senator from Tennessee refers relate to the W. P. A. alone.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct; and on W. P. A. alone the average is 13.1 percent.

Mr. McADOO. Then a 25-percent restriction would exclude all the States of the Union, because no State could comply with the requirement, unless the President were to abate the law in accordance with the proviso embodied in the suggested amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The diversity of conditions in the country is so great, as I said a moment ago, that it is impossible to apply a uniform percentage in the distribution of relief funds, either direct or work-projects relief.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a couple of inquiries?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Did I understand the Senator correctly to say that because of the fact that the States, as a whole, have contributed either 13 or 24 percent, therefore he reaches the conclusion that they cannot contribute 25 percent which might be required by the pending amendment?

Mr. McADOO. I have assumed that the figures of the Works Progress Administration show the limit of capacity of the various communities which have already contributed to relief projects the percentage indicated, and I say if a higher percentage were exacted as an absolute requirement, on the basis of the averages given, not a State in the Union could comply with the requirement.

Mr. ADAMS. The point I was trying to reach was that the statement that the States contributed a certain amount would not be conclusive as to what they could contribute; that is, the aggregate wealth of the 48 States is identical with the aggregate wealth of the United States, as there is within the financial capacity of the States all the financial power there is within the United States. So I do not see how the Senator can reach the conclusion the States cannot put up more than a certain amount because they have in the past put up only a certain amount.

Mr. McADOO. I do not quite agree with the Senator's deduction. I have used the word "States" in the sense in which it was employed in these reports, and that, of course, means the aggregate of the communities in the States which have contributed to Works Progress projects. The aggregate of the contributions of the communities within the States has brought the average to the point indicated by these reports. That is a very different thing from stating that it is a maximum contribution. I have no doubt that the States as States could contribute more in many instances than the local communities within the States could contribute, just as the United States Government can contribute more to the States themselves, regardless of their condition, than those States themselves might be able to contribute.

Mr. President, referring to the diversity of conditions, I should like to refer to a situation in my own State, California, with respect to the relief problem. I do not think anyone in the United States, except those who live in the State of California, understands the dimensions and the complications of the problem which we have to face each year. The University of California furnished these figures the other day:

> The estimate is that there are 37,000 migratory children in California, and 150,000 transients coming from other States.

The mayor of Los Angeles telegraphed me, saying:

> These tremendous burdens now being borne entirely by the resources of the States and local subdivisions—

He is referring now to the transient problem—> greatly aggravating our unemployment relief problem, emphasize the necessity of maintaining Federal relief program here without restriction of 40 percent local contribution, which would make it impossible for us to qualify.

Colonel Connolly, a lieutenant colonel in the Army, who was assigned to take care of work relief in Los Angeles County, which alone has something more than two and a half million people, because he was an Army engineer and was not, therefore, susceptible to political influence or control, and could, therefore, with greater authority, administer relief, advises me, as follows:

To sum up, we have at present a construction program in Los Angeles County of high integrity, but we already have so many conditions to meet in getting public bodies to sponsor projects that the additional 40-percent restriction will absolutely wreck our program in this county.

That means, Mr. President, that it is increasingly difficult to get the right kind of projects, to absorb and take care of unemployment, and the theory upon which these projects are usually undertaken is that they shall be near centers where there is unemployment. If an additional condition requiring a 40-percent contribution by the sponsors or even 25 percent should be imposed, it would probably result in our being unable to go forward at all in the unemployment part of this undertaking, and many people would be absolutely thrown out of employment because of what, I think, is an unreasonable, arbitrary, and unnecessary provision.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a telegram which I have received from Hon. Angelo J. Rossi, mayor of San Francisco, and also one from Hon. Frank L. Shaw, mayor of Los Angeles.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., June 15, 1937.

Hon. WM. GIBBS MCADOO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Through press have been advised Senate Appropriations Committee's action in adopting provision requiring 40 percent local contribution on all W. P. A. projects. Based upon present contributions for W. P. A. projects, city and county of San Francisco has adopted its 1937–38 budget, and it will be impossible for us to proceed with our W. P. A. program if the 40-percent rule becomes effective.

Regards,

ANGELO J. ROSSI, Mayor.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., June 12, 1937.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Re telegram: The large portion of relief load carried by political subdivisions here completely precludes possibility of participating in any Works Program for unemployment relief that would require 40 percent local contribution. Practically all current revenues that can be made available for the purpose are already being used to carry those portions of the relief load for which Federal aid makes no provision. These portions comprise 61 percent of total. We have no bonding capacity by means of which to raise any increased contribution toward a works-relief program. From our standpoint, we see unemployment as still very definitely a Federal Government problem, with which local resources cannot begin to cope until private industry is able to absorb a much larger proportion of workers. Will assemble data on transients and advise you as quickly as possible.

FRANK L. SHAW.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1937.

Hon. FRANK L. SHAW,
Mayor, Los Angeles, Calif.:

Concerning pending relief measure in Senate, please wire me immediately what is the total relief load for transients for last 12 months of available reports. How much of this was paid by the city? How much by county? How much by the Federal Government? Do you think limitation should be put on relief appropriation requiring political subdivisions of the States to contribute 40 percent against the Federal Government's contribution of 60 percent? Shall appreciate full expression of your views.

W. G. MCADOO.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MCADOO. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. If the Senate should adopt the so-called Robinson amendment, it is my understanding that it would not be mandatory upon those administering the relief funds to require cities and towns seeking aid to put up 25 percent. Is that true?

Mr. MCADOO. No, it would not be mandatory; I concede that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Would the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas work to aid some States to their advantage and to the disadvantage of other States?

Mr. MCADOO. I cannot say as to that. I do not think it makes much difference. I think the assumption would very properly be made by the administrative officers that they must use every possible means to get 25 percent from the different communities where the projects are to be located, and, failing to get such percentage, that they must call upon the President to make the necessary investigation through administrative agencies to ascertain whether or not a lower percentage might be acceptable from them.

All that means delay. All that means, in addition, that there will be inevitably some embarrassment and some humiliation to communities if their exact financial condition should reveal their inability to contribute such a small amount that they might be made the subject of comment. I do not think the latter is very serious, but the red tape necessarily involved under the Byrnes and Robinson amendments would involve needless delay and time, and perhaps a great deal of suffering.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator understands that these investigations are now made, does he not?

Mr. MCADOO. Yes; they are made. I do not think, though, that the same degree of public attention is attracted as if this provision were put into effect.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. Hopkins' statement was that he has a bond division, with experts, and whenever an application is presented they determine whether or not the municipality can sell its bonds and then determine the taxpaying capacity of the individual applicants and make an investigation of four or five different factors at the time. I have not at hand the page of the hearings where he made that statement, but I wanted to call attention to the fact that Mr. Hopkins does make that statement.

Mr. MCADOO. I understand that.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Mr. MCKELLAR. There are some 38 States which cannot issue bonds until authorized by their legislatures, and the legislatures are nearly all adjourned. Ten States cannot issue bonds at all. So that settles the situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MCADOO. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, where a city or school district or county has already reached its bond limit, so it could not by popular vote issue any more bonds, or where it has already levied the maximum tax permitted under the constitution or charter of the city, manifestly such a city or school district or county might make a showing that it could not raise the 40 percent or 25 percent or 10 or 5 or any other required percent.

Let us assume a city or school district or county has not reached its limitation in the issuance of bonds, and even in the investigation of such a municipality the President should say, "You have the ability to raise more money." The law requires that that ability shall be exercised and tested after a popular election, which they could not hold until next November, and in some States it could not even be held that early because of the requirements of notice and all such things. Although there might be a technical ability to raise more money by bond issue, the necessary delay in the machinery of carrying out such a provision and ascertaining such ability would nullify the effect of any relief that might be granted, or postpone it so long that it would be almost equal to denying relief to the community.

If the community had levied its limit of taxation and could not levy additional taxes without a session of the legislature to amend its charter or grant that power to levy more taxes, the same situation would exist. The President or any investigator might hold that they had technically the legal ability to raise more money, but the requirement that they should do it would nullify the benefit proposed to be carried by the appropriation.

Mr. MCADOO. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. He is entirely right about that. Under the laws of California a referendum is always required for the issuance of public obligations of any character. The result is the delays incident to such referendum might defeat the whole purpose of the relief project.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Under the provision that the President should only be satisfied that the applicant is unable to supply 25 percent, there is no requirement other than that which is now exercised by Mr. Hopkins, who insists that the applicant must make a larger contribution unless the applicant can convice him that the applicant is unable to supply it.

Mr. McADOO. I concede that. Those are matters of informal negotiation under existing conditions with different communities, and they have been taken into consideration, no doubt, in all the relief that has been dispensed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield further to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there is a difference, as I contend, in informal negotiations carried on around the table between a representative of the Administrator and the local authorities as to how much they can put up; but whenever we write into the statute a fixed standard which must be adhered to unless the President makes an exception of any community, then we encourage every other community that learns about the exception which has been made, in order to evade the provisions of the law, to bring pressure to bear on the President and his agents to do that same thing for them when they might be able to do more.

Mr. McADOO. The Senator has stated substantially what I expected to say myself, and I thank him for his statement.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator be kind enough to yield again?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. If, as stated in the hearings, it is announced to the applicant that some applicants are asked to put up one-half of 1 percent, would not there be the same incentive to the applicants to say, "Mr. Administrator, inasmuch as you do not require one city to put up more than one-half of 1 percent, why require us to put up 50 percent?"

Mr. McADOO. I do not think that necessarily follows; but where we express a rule in a statute, we do require a greater degree of strictness in administering relief than may be possible or wise when we are trying to relieve human suffering or necessity.

The question is a very simple one. It comes down to the fact that we have undertaken, ever since the depression came on, to relieve suffering and want throughout the United States. We have been trying, of course, to cut down the relief expenditures as much as possible by making every effort that the Congress could make within its power to restore prosperity, because through that means a greater amount of unemployment would be absorbed. However, we have not yet arrived at the point where we can throw these people largely or wholly upon the possibilities of private employment.

I do not think prosperity has yet been thoroughly established in the United States. We have yet to go some distance before we reach such a firm foundation, for our economic order particularly, that we can reduce or abandon Federal aid for the relief of our citizens who may be in want, and take up the slack of unemployment until private agencies can do their part. We are bound to continue the policy we have already adopted, and we should not throw unnecessary restraints or restrictions around it.

In saying that I am just as keen as any Member of this body to see that every possible restriction or limitation or precaution is taken to administer the funds so wisely that there will be no waste, no graft, no inefficiency. But the very nature of the work makes it impossible to administer it with the same degree of effectiveness as if the problem were different. The question of organizing the country from one end to the other to meet the varying conditions found in different localities, varying degrees of poverty and want or unemployment in the different localities, requires a degree of ability which would tax the brain of the ablest men we have. For my part I think Mr. Hopkins has done a very good job and I doubt if anyone could have done it any better. At least he has done a great piece of work for the country. I have no sympathy with the many unfair criticisms which have been directed against him.

I desire to advert again to the contributions made by the different States. Much was said yesterday about the State of New York getting more than it was entitled to. I do not think it makes any difference which State gets the most from the Works Progress Administration, provided that State demonstrates the need for it in order to succor human misery or human want. That is the reason why this is a national problem. It is the duty of the United States Government to go into every part of this great land and see to it, as far as it is possible for the resources at its command to accomplish it, that want and need and human suffering shall be relieved. So long as I have a vote in this body I shall support that fundamental policy, and persist in voting for it until we have won the victory.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that some of the Senators who are so deeply interested in helping those who need relief fail to realize that the adoption of this amendment would furnish more money for relief than otherwise would be available.

One billion five hundred million dollars of Government money is made available for relief by this joint resolution. If no money is furnished in addition by any of the States or by any of the counties or by any of the cities, that is all the money that will be available for relief in the entire United States. If 25 percent is put up by the States, 25 percent will be added to the $1,500,000,000.

The Congress has cut down enormously the appropriations for relief. It is doubted by a great many students and statisticians whether $1,500,000,000 will meet the requirements of relief. Certainly it is in the interest of the poorer communities of the country to see that the fund is added to if there is any way to add to it. There is but one way to add to it, and that is to have those cities, those States, and those counties that can afford to do the work themselves do it, and others do it with as little use of Federal funds as possible. In other words, if 40 percent is added to the $1,500,000,000 by cities and States and counties that can afford to add it, there will be that much more relief in those communities that are in such a financial condition that they cannot contribute but little.

I am surprised to hear Senators who have taken part in this debate constantly say, as was said by the distinguished scholar and statesman from Nebraska, that there are States, counties, communities, and sponsors that cannot put up 25 percent, and that if they do not put up 25 percent they will not get any relief. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas expressly provides that if the President finds that communities are unable to put up 25 percent—that is the word that is used, "unable"—he may determine what they are able to put up.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] if the 25 percent was an arbitrary amount, and the Senator from Arizona had to admit that it was not an arbitrary amount. The Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] was just asked if the 25 percent was an arbitrary amount, and, if not put up, whether all relief should be refused. He had to admit that it was not arbitrary, but he answered the question by saying that red tape will have to be employed to find out whether or not a community is able to put up 25 percent. That red tape has to be employed today, because Mr. Hopkins has the absolute discretion to determine whether a community shall put up one-half of 1 percent, as was done in New York City, or 45 percent, I believe, that was put up in other places.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The point which the Senator is now making seems to me very clear and conclusive; but, having made the point, does the amendment change the situation in any respect? Will not Mr. Hopkins administer this fund, as he is now administering it, upon the theory that this and that community cannot put up the specified amount? In other words, if he finds a community that can put up the specified amount, will he nevertheless give it the fund?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I think there will be a difference as to the discretion in this respect:

At the present time apparently the Administrator has been trying to balance the equities as between States and between cities. In other words, he says that since the State of New York has put up a total of 37 percent, considering other forms of relief, therefore, it should put up only one-half of 1 percent under the W. P. A. I think the whole theory of balancing the equities between States is wrong. The relief authorities go on the idea that we should be equitable in benefiting States or counties or towns. That is not the policy of this joint resolution or the policy of relief. If the relief authorities will forget for 1 minute that this fund is not to benefit a town or a county or a State, but it is to relieve those on the relief rolls, they will not give any consideration to how much a State has put up for other relief projects.

The proposition here is that primarily every State, county, and municipality has placed upon it the obligation, as far as it is able, to support its own unemployed. That is fundamental. The Federal Government comes in to prevent suffering only when the local community, State, county, or municipality is unable to do it. That is the only justification of the Federal Government being in this matter.

If a great community like the city of New York was able to contribute enormous sums for relief under the Public Works Administration, and is still able to contribute large sums under the Works Progress Administration why, becaues it contributed large sums under the P. W. A., should it not contribute under the W. P. A. to whatever extent its financial ability will permit it to do?

In the argument with regard to the State of New York, to which I listened, in which I believe the distinguished Senator from New York proved that New York had contributed to relief generally somewhere around 37 percent, I take it that he argued that having contributed so generously to relief, to a much larger extent than many other States, therefore New York should be required to contribute only about one-half of 1 percent to the W. P. A. projects, since the aggregate of all relief made New York's contributions 37½ percent. That is on the theory that one State should not contribute any more than another. That is on the theory that one county should not contribute any more than another, that one city should not contribute any more than another. That is not the true theory of relief. It is based on the ability of a State, a county, a community, a municipality to relieve distress; not on what it may be determined that it is reasonable for it to pay.

Therefore, I say that this amendment is nothing on earth except an expression of the sentiment of Congress. What does it say? It says to Mr. Harry Hopkins, "The fact that the city of New York had contributed 37½ percent to the relief of destitution in that State by subscribing to P. W. A. projects is no reason why it should not put up at least 25 percent of the money furnished under W. P. A. projects." Unless we announce here that policy, unless we say to Mr. Hopkins, "You cannot excuse a rich community from putting up at least 25 percent in contributions under W. P. A., because it has put up 45 percent in contributions to other projects", he will follow the same policy that he has followed in the past.

If this requirement of 25 percent had been in force on W. P. A. projects, there would today be a balance in this fund of millions of dollars, available for sections of the country that are not able to put up much money. We must get away from the theory that relief is based on equity of contribution by States or that it is based upon equity of advantage to the various States. Those two policies have nothing to do with this matter. All that Congress has a right to consider is that where a State, a county, or a municipality is unable to support its unemployed the Federal Government must do it, either by a dole or by furnishing work relief; and all we say in this amendment is that "it is the sense of Congress, Mr. Hopkins, that when a State or a county or a city is able to contribute 25 percent as against your 75 percent for a work-relief project, it should do so, no matter how much it has contributed to other charities." That is what we say.

An argument has been made by the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] which has considerable weight. He asks, "How about the 'white collar' projects?"

I realize that it is very hard to find the value of a "white collar" project. We can find the permanent value of a sewerage system, of waterworks, of electric lights, of airfields; but the kind of work which is done for the "white collar" crowd for education, for recreation, is hard to measure in value and hard to obtain sponsors for. To avoid that it was my purpose to offer the proposed amendment to the text, not to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], to take line 17 where it reads, "at least 25 percent of the cost of the project is to be supplied from non-Federal funds in money, materials, or services", and to insert after the word "project" language to make it read in this way, "at least 25 percent of the cost of any project of a permanent character is to be supplied by non-Federal funds", and so forth. That limits the 25 percent to projects of a permanent character, leaving out all of these temporary projects which are intended for the benefit of the "white collar" people, women, and children, educational and recreational projects, and so forth.

I want this fund added to. We all know now that under this appropriation of $1,500,000,000 about 25 percent of the relief under W. P. A. must be cut out during the next year. I should like to know what is to be done with that 25 percent. If, on the other hand, the fund can be added to, even on the average of 25 percent, then possibly we will be able to take care of the unemployed during the next year without any additional appropriation.

I realize that there is a constant fear in the minds of Senators that the needy in some little community in their State are going to be neglected. I would not be voting for the amendment if I thought it were possible for such a community being neglected. I think they will be benefited. I think more funds will be added by those communities which at the present time are fortunately prosperous. As the distinguished Senator from Nebraska said, some communities are prosperous, others are in poverty; some industries are prosperous, others are not. We must treat this question as a national problem, and in treating it so we must cease to argue how much the city of New York has put up. We have to consider how much the city of New York can afford to put up, or we will never have a fund with which to work.

In some State we may find one city exceedingly prosperous, by reason of the great copper industry, for instance. That city will be prosperous and booming, and that city can afford to contribute 40 percent toward any W. P. A. project. There may be another community in the State where perhaps the people are engaged in the cattle industry, which has been in the depths for years, and the towns in that section cannot put up much as a contribution. The President will determine such facts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Senator proceeding on the theory that not only the billion and a half will be expended out of the Federal Treasury but that 25 percent additional will be expended, and therefore will augment that sum?

Mr. PITTMAN. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator then does not agree with the author of the original amendment, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] when, on the 3d day of June, he said:

> If this is done—
> Referring to this 40-percent provision—
> it makes little difference how much actually is appropriated for relief. If the States and public and political subdivisions have to pay part of the costs, the money just won't have to be asked for and spent. Probably the 1938 relief expenditures could be held to $750,000,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. I simply do not agree with that. I do not think it is logical, if he said it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from South Carolina says he does not agree with it, either. He did not say it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought there was some error.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from South Carolina yesterday said that at the time he said that an entirely different situation was contemplated.

Mr. BYRNES. Oh, no.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I misunderstood the Senator, of course I do not wish to misstate what he said; but in explaining this interview the Senator had with the newspapermen he stated, as I understood him, that when he made that statement he did not contemplate a situation which now he says he visualizes.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator misunderstood me, if he had any such understanding. The Senator from South Carolina said that he had no recollection of such an interview. I issued no statement at all. At various times I have answered questions of newspapermen on this subject and I said yesterday that while I could not agree with many statements attributed to me by newspapers, I did not quarrel with them because they were generally much more accurate than one had a right to expect of them, when you consider the circumstances under which their representatives worked. I said as to the statement that was made in the minority report that while I had no recollection of the statement that it was entirely possible that I had expressed the hope that by the adoption of the 50-percent matching provision with the requirement that a certificate of inability to comply be furnished in order to secure an exception, that $750,000,000 would be required. I know I did not express the opinion that it would result in only $750,000,000 being spent but it is entirely possible that I might have said that it was my hope that under that proposal only $750,000,000 would be required. I was of the opinion that the 50-percent provision and the requirement of the certificate would reduce the amount considerably. That was why I advocated it. I recall expressing the opinion on one occasion to a representative of the press that it would reduce it to $1,000,000,000. That was my guess. Necessarily, it was only a guess.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me just another observation, I am glad to have the Senator's explanation of this interview which was put in the minority report. Whatever the Senator said about it and whatever his thought was, it was in connection with his effort at that time to reduce the total from a billion and a half to a billion?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. My hope was to reduce it by the matching provision. I stated in a speech made over the radio and published in the RECORD that if it were reduced to a billion dollars and 50 percent of each project had to be put up by the local governments, it would make available for work projects $2,000,000,000 instead of one, the same line of thought now being presented by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada permit me to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question I propose to propound is one I previously asked of the Senator from Nevada—that is, whether now the Senator from South Carolina believes that the requirement for putting up 25 percent will add 25 percent to the billion and a half appropriated, or whether it will ultimately reduce the amount the Federal Government will put up?

Mr. BYRNES. Does the Senator mean under the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas or under the original amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. They are two entirely different things. The provision of the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina would cause a reduction. My opinion is that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will not reduce the amount, because when the provision requiring a certificate is withdrawn, I do not believe the reduction in the Federal expenditure hoped for by me will be brought about.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator does hope, however, that either of these provisions which may be adopted will result in a reduction of the Federal contribution below the billion and a half?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. My hope is that it will result in increasing the contribution from local communities, and in decreasing the contribution of the Federal Government.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is no difference between the position of the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Nevada, except that the Senator from South Carolina feels that a billion and a half would be enough, and that therefore the Government's contribution would be reduced by whatever the sponsors put up. I do not believe that sum will be nearly sufficient, and I think there will be an addition to the $1,500,000,000, by requiring a minimum contribution of 25 percent by those who are able to make it.

I must admit, however, that if only 25 percent were put up by all the sponsors, of course, it would not add 25 percent, because in the very act which authorizes the President to eliminate the restriction, if he finds that the sponsor is unable to pay its proportion, he may fix the amount of contribution at a figure he thinks the sponsor is able to pay, less than 25 percent.

It is perfectly evident that there will be many cases in which the sponsor cannot put up 25 percent. The "white collar" projects, the educational projects, the recreational projects, or the youth projects are not permanent benefits. They provide temporary employment. It is difficult to obtain sponsors for such projects. I propose to cut them out entirely, as far as the 25-percent limitation is concerned. In some cases, of course, 50-percent contributions can be obtained.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not know what the proposal of the Senator is, but I may say as to the so-called "white collar" projects that there is a great difference. For instance, take the sewing projects which have been discussed, or take what is known as the actors' project, which is a Federal project, where the money is not put up by any State, where there is no contribution from a sponsor. The companies of actors are established as a project by W. P. A. nationally. Nobody is asked to make a contribution, and they are not affected by the provision.

Mr. PITTMAN. So as to avoid the question raised, I propose, after action on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, to amend the text of the bill in line 17, page 4, where it reads:

> At least 40 percent of the cost of the project is to be supplied from non-Federal funds, in money, materials, or services.

Of course, the 40 percent will be changed to 25 percent, and it will be changed to provide that at least 25 percent of the cost of any project of a permanent character is to be supplied from non-Federal funds. I think that is necessary in order to get away from these temporary educational, recreational, and other projects of that type.

The projects which we seek to compel the sponsors who are able to pay for are projects in the nature of permanent projects, electric-light systems, water systems, sewer systems, and so forth, so that those matters which are of permanent benefit to the community are permanent projects. Where a community has the money with which to pay its contribution, it ought to do it, in justice to those in this country, which cannot do it. That is what I mean.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator be kind enough to yield again?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator speaks of calling upon a community financially able to make the contribution to do so. If there is a city financially able to make the contribution and it has one project for building a sewerage system to which there is no question of the city being financially able to contribute, it is asked to make a 25-percent contribution. Let us say there is another project of a different character in that city which the Senator would refer to as a "white collar" project. If that city is able to make the 25-percent contribution in the case of the sewerage-system construction, why should it not make the 25-percent contribution for its "white collar" project?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Administrator makes stipulations to that effect today, and he will continue to do so. I do not wish to confuse the necessity for and advisability of 25-percent contribution in the case of permanent projects, with the advisability of requiring 25-percent contribution for the "white collar" projects. There is no doubt that the Administrator has heretofore required more than 25-percent contribution for some "white collar" project when the community could afford to make a larger contribution than 25 percent.

Mr. BYRNES. I know it is a fact that the Administrator in some cases has required a substantial contribution in the case of so-called "white collar" projects, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada does not propose to change that practice.

Mr. PITTMAN. The minimum of 25 percent under my proposed amendment will apply only to projects which are in their nature permanent. I think it is wise to make such a provision. It is wise to do so in order to remove the fear of at least some of the Members of Congress who may think that the Administrator may try to demand a contribution of 25 percent for every "white collar" project in the United States, and turn to the proposal here made as authority for making such demand. Therefore, I say, leave out such a proposal with respect to "white collar" projects, but put it in in connection with permanent projects, which will be of permanent benefit to every community in which the money will be spent. The appropriations for such purposes are small.

The Senator from New York referred to contributions made by the city of New York. In estimating that the city of New York contributed 37 percent for all relief the Senator undoubtedly includes the very enormous sums of money which the city of New York has contributed on P. W. A. projects for permanent improvements of the city of New York, such as sidewalks, streets, roads, waterworks, sewer systems, and so forth. I do not wish to criticize the city of New York, or any other city, but I do not look upon that as a charitable act upon the part of the city of New York. The city was going to build these streets, these waterworks, these sewer systems in any event. It had the money with which to do it. It would have done it even though the Government had not contributed a cent. Whether the Government contributed 55 percent or not the city of New York would have gone ahead with that work. It was a gift which, in my opinion, was totally unnecessary. The gift was not necessary to build the project, because the project would have been built anyway by the city of New York. Yet because a great city has accepted hundreds of millions of dollars as a gratuity from the United States Government and has spent that gratuity, it then credits itself with 45-percent contribution as a contribution to charity. As a matter of fact, they received a charity gift of 55 percent.

Mr. President, we have no policy, and there has never been a policy expressed by any one of the relief departments of this Government after over 4 years of expenditures of large sums of money. Is it not possible that this body is willing to express its sentiment on the subject? Are we willing to say that we think the Administrator should demand a contribution of at least 25 percent on a permanent project if the sponsors are able to pay it? Are we afraid to say that to the Administrator, when at the same time we say that if the President finds that the sponsors are not able to pay it they do not have to pay it, and red tape is placed around this proposition? We have the same red tape right now under Hopkins that we would have under this amendment. There will be just as much discretion under this proposal as there is under existing law. The only difference is that the Congress of the United States has the temerity for once to say that we feel that if a sponsor is able to put up 25 percent he ought to do it. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to be heard, first with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and then with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If any Senator desires to be heard on the opposite side of the question, I shall not speak at this time; but, at the proper time, I do intend to speak upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I shall not presume to take the time of the Senate to indulge in any lengthy discussion of this amendment, because in the last 2 or 3 days I think every possible angle of the subject has been discussed. However, I do wish to say one or two words as to my own position and what I believe is the real question involved here, which is a matter of principle and so far as Democrats are concerned who were candidates for election in the last campaign, and who are here by reason of supporting the Democratic platform and the President, it seems to me that their course is clear. So far as those are concerned who are not here by reason of the last election but who at that time were out defending the platform and the President, it seems to me that their course is clear.

Something was said here yesterday about the Democratic platform, and I presume it is in the RECORD. I wish to repeat something contained in the platform. The first three lines of the platform, under the head of "Unemployment", are:

> We believe that unemployment is a national problem, and that it is an inescapable obligation of our Government to meet it in a national way.

I had supposed that I knew the definition of the word "inescapable"; but it seems that we are finding an escape. It is true that farther down in the platform it is stated that "Where business fails to supply such employment we believe that work at prevailing wages"—and that is the real thing in that clause—"should be provided in cooperation with State and local governments on useful public projects."

The obligation which we said was national we also said was inescapable; but it seems that we are about to vote upon a proposition which supplies us with a qualifying amendment.

Now, at our first opportunity to keep a promise that we made to the people, we find that although we said in the last campaign that unemployment is a national problem, and is an inescapable obligation of our Government, and must be met in a national way—and our promise to deal with the question in the manner promised in our platform brought many of us into Congress—it is not now an inescapable obligation, it is not now a national proposition, but it is a national proposition plus a State proposition so long as the State will contribute; and if the State, county, or municipality, as a taxing authority, refuses to contribute, then the care of the unemployed in the United States and those who need relief is no longer a national problem, no longer a State problem, no longer inescapable, but it is going to be a problem for the hungry themselves to deal with.

Mr. President, there are throughout the United States many thousands of communities which do not believe in the New Deal. Of course we carried practically all the States in the Union by an enormous majority, but there were 17,000,000 votes which were not in accord with us; and in that great body of votes throughout the United States, among all these municipalities and cities and towns and counties, there are frequently taxing authorities which do not believe in the New Deal relief; there are taxing authorities which do not want to contribute. Are we about to say, then, that we did not mean it when we said unemployment was an inescapable national problem, but we only meant that the needy and the hungry should be supplied where the local taxing authority was willing to contribute, or was willing to contribute in the amount which we now say it must contribute?

I agree, Mr. President, that in most communities of the United States the taxing authorities want to contribute, and do contribute, to the extent they are able; but they may have other obligations which are just as pressing upon them. As has been said here this afternoon, there are various communities in this country whose people, through no fault of their own, because of flood, drought, and other disasters, have been absolutely without return. They have worked year after year, they have had no crops, and their property has been destroyed; but even in those communities, because of the class of citizenship which is there, it might be possible, if they were put to it, to raise a little more money to take care of the situation which we said was an inescapable national obligation.

Because I come here by reason of my support of that platform, and because I come here by reason of my support of the man who said that none should go hungry in the United States, and that people who are in distress and in need should be clothed and housed, I desire to register my protest against any proposition, however strongly it may be advocated by those who may believe that it meets the situation, that will modify the promise we made to the people.

I desire now to read from the Democratic platform adopted in 1932, having in mind this inescapable national obligation:

> We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe.

We said in plain terms that relief was a national problem, that we proposed to take care of those in distress; and now, when we have the first opportunity to keep that pledge, it is proposed to say to them that we will take care of them provided a local taxing authority which does not believe in the program does not take care of them, but if it refuses to take care of them, and an inspector concludes that in some way taxes may be raised which will enable them to take care of them, then, in that event, the hungry and the poor and the unhoused may shift for themselves.

We have taxing authorities—and they are not all in Republican communities in the United States—that do not believe in relief. In their hearts they believe in the good old doctrine of supply and demand. They believe that where three men are seeking one job the law of supply and demand should determine the price paid the laborer, that the man who will take the least should get the job, and as to the other two the devil may take the hindmost. That is the situation with which we are confronted today.

There is nothing to be gained, to my mind, by putting in a 25-percent requirement or a 40-percent requirement, because, as a matter of fact, the administration now is doing whatever can be done to secure proper contributions from the various sponsors. I may say that I am not so much interested in the sponsors as I am in those who are seeking relief. To the extent that the Administrator can secure contributions, he does it; but if there are two counties that have been stricken by drought for years, as we have in the northeastern part of my State, and one is willing to and can put up 5 or 10 percent, and the other one, equally pressed, placing a greater value on some of its other necessities is not willing to put up 5 percent, shall those who are in need and who are suffering there have no relief, or shall they do as some are now being compelled to do who live in counties that cannot provide relief—join a caravan that is going out to Oregon and Washington, whose Senators have told us what a problem it is to take care of them?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question or two. I understand the position he is taking, but my inquiry is whether or not he feels that the average contribution of 13 percent which is now being made by communities within the States where projects are constructed represents a fair and adequate contribution from the locality?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. It would depend, of course, upon their resources whether or not it would be fair; but if it were fair and the local community were of the opinion that 5 or 6 or 7 percent of that percentage was needed more for some other necessary purpose, then I think our national platform should prevail and that it would be our duty to take care of relief; and I think that is what we are now doing.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator construe the national platform as declaring that the relief problem is exclusively a national problem?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. That it is an inescapable national problem.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation with reference to the amendment which was suggested, at least, by the present Presiding Officer, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who felt that a distinction should be drawn between permanent and temporary projects as to the requirement of a contribution.

It seems to me that there is a different principle which properly underlies this problem than the one which the Senator from Nevada has used.

My interest in the matter, and I think the interest of many of those who favor contribution by the States under the amendments which are pending is that the contribution is made to afford relief, and to me there is no difference as to the obligation of the community, whether it be a city, county, or State.

I presume it is proper to ask the Chair whether or not his amendment was actually offered or did he merely say that he was going to offer it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada said that when it was in order he would offer the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I had assumed that perhaps it had been offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been offered.

Mr. ADAMS. I take occasion, while I am on my feet, to make the comment that I started to make, which was that the contribution from the localities, whether it be from the States, counties, or cities, in my judgment, should be based upon the obligation of the communities to contribute to relief rather than on the basis of the benefits which the communities are to receive.

Permanent projects, of course, contribute to the permanent wealth of the community in a visible form. On the other hand, what we may speak of as a temporary project may contribute fully as much to the actual wealth of the community in the preservation of life, the preservation of health, and the preservation of the general well-being or even in the production of material things which are subject to consumption, as distinguished from permanent improvements, which have a longer duration. So I will be disposed, when the amendment is offered by the Senator from Nevada, to oppose it as a letting down and a weakening of the obligation which should be imposed upon the States under the very argument which the Senator from Nevada has so ably expounded on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] a question?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is my understanding he intends to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas as a substitute for his own amendment to the committee amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. In the remarks which I had intended to submit, it was my purpose to make that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I had intended to address the Senate very briefly on the subject of the Byrnes amendment, as well as the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, but if there is a chance to get a vote without further delay, I shall forego the remarks I intended to make. I think there is a general desire to vote on the question before the Senate adjourns or recesses this afternoon. If there is a chance to help achieve that end by foregoing any remarks on my part, I should like to contribute to an early vote by declining to make any remarks at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had intended to submit some remarks, but I shall be glad to join the Senator from Kentucky in foregoing any remarks if it will lead to a prompt disposition of the entire matter; but I do not desire to have the pending amendment disposed of and then have the joint resolution itself go over until Monday for further consideration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there is no way by which we can agree on the disposition of the remainder of the joint resolution. There are other committee amendments still undisposed of, and I do not know how much debate they may involve.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Kentucky, I should say that I intend to offer a substitute when it shall be in order, and I intend to discuss it. I see no possibility of concluding consideration of the matter this afternoon unless it is intended to have an extended session.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with that statement in mind, and with the knowledge that other Senators desire to speak, I am convinced there is no probability of disposing of the joint resolution this afternoon.

I should like to submit a request for a unanimous-consent agreement that will assure final disposition of the pending committee amendment and all amendments that may be offered to it. In fact, I should like to have a limitation of debate on the joint resolution itself if it is possible to get it. I do not know whether it will be possible to do so, but, with the view of testing the sense of the Senate, I shall submit the request.

Let me say that a number of Senators have informed me that they should like to be present when the vote is taken, but have necessarily absented themselves in fulfillment of engagements made a week or so ago. The Senate has been in the habit of adjourning over the weekends. The time is approaching, if it is not at hand, when that pleasurable procedure will necessarily be abandoned. However, in view of all the circumstances, it is my thought that we might enter into an agreement limiting debate so as to assure final disposition of the matter in a reasonable time and enable us to pass the conclusion of the joint resolution over until Monday.

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its labors today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next; that when the Senate convenes on Monday no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 20 minutes on the pending committee amendment and amendments thereto, nor longer than 20 minutes on the joint resolution itself. There ought to be a limitation on other amendments, also. I suggest that the 20-minute limitation apply to the joint resolution and the 15-minute limitation to all amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, does that contemplate 15 minutes on the committee amendment and amendments thereto?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So on the pending question, which involves an amendment to the committee amendment, there would be 30 minutes?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; there would be 15 minutes on the pending question—the proposal contemplating 15 minutes on any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered, and 20 minutes on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 16), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes, the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed to strike out in section 2 "stated in" and insert in lieu thereof "required under", and to strike out in section 4 the word "contract" where it appears immediately preceding the word "legally" and insert in lieu thereof the word "contractor."

The message further announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5 and 7 to the bill (H. R. 4064), making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, and concurred therein; and that the House had receded from its amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 8 to the bill and concurred therein.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 18) to authorize and direct the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in the enrollment of House bill 4064, the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1938, to make a change in the text of the appropriation for pensions under the Veterans' Administration, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CORRECTION IN ENROLLMENT OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 18, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to insert in the fourth paragraph under the caption "Veterans' Administration", after the word "Administration", the following additional matter: "accruing during the fiscal year 1938 or in prior fiscal years."

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate concur in the concurrent resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF GEN. WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON BEADLE

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Library, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 10, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Under the procedure of allowing each State to present two statues for inclusion in Statuary Hall in the Capitol, it is necessary for Congress to accept the statue presented by a State. The State of South Dakota is ready to present to the Nation a statue of Gen. William Henry Harrison Beadle, and the concurrent resolution accepts the statue on behalf of the Government in order that the ceremonies may proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 10) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the statue of Gen. William Henry Harrison Beadle, presented by the State of South Dakota, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of the Congress be tendered said State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his valor as a soldier and his distinguished service as an educator; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed, and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of South Dakota.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting the nomination of Frank LeBlond Kloeb, of Ohio, to be United States district judge for the northern district of Ohio, vice George P. Hahn, deceased, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Louis A. Johnson, of West Virginia, to be Assistant Secretary of War.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry citizens or officers for appointment or promotion in the Regular Army.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Capt. Andrew C. Pickens to be a rear admiral in the Navy from the 3d day of June, 1937; and also the nominations of sundry officers for promotion in the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

THOMAS C. TRIMBLE, JR.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary I report favorably the nomination of Thomas C. Trimble, Jr., of Arkansas, to be United States district judge for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that judgeship has been vacant for several months. On behalf of my colleague the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] and myself, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask also that the President be notified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified.

SAUL HAAS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I report favorably the nomination of Saul Haas, of Seattle, Wash., to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 30, with headquarters at Seattle, Wash.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BONE. I ask also that the President be notified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS TO MONDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess under the order previously entered.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, the Senate took a recess until Monday, June 21, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JUNE 18, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Father of all mercies, we, Thine unworthy servants, do give Thee most humble and hearty thanks for all Thy goodness and loving kindnesses to us. Grant us in all our doubts and uncertainties the grace to ask what Thou wouldst have us do, that the spirit of wisdom may save us from all false choices and that in Thy light we may see light and in Thy straight path we may not stumble. Grant that this day we may fall into no sin and all our doings may be righteous in Thy sight. Blesseth is the man that maketh the Lord his trust. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TRANSPORTATION OF THE BLIND

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, my bill, H. R. 6049, which has passed the House, is intended to make it possible for the blind in traveling on the railroads and transportation systems of the country to be accompanied by their "seeing eye" or guide dogs. Hearings were held before a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, consisting of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELLY], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLFENDEN], who reported the bill favorably, and it was subsequently reported favorably by the full Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It had previously received the favorable recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I first became interested in this legislation owing to my friendship with a very dear friend that I have in my home city, Hoquiam, Wash., whose name is John E. Nelson, who has been blind for a number of years. Mr. Nelson went to the Seeing-Eye Institution, Morristown, N. J., and took the required course there and secured one of their guide dogs, whose name is Tinker. Of course, whenever I have been home, while Congress has not been in session, I have seen my friend John and Tinker, who are inseparable, and noted the wonderful companionship existing between them and the service that trained guide dog is rendering to my friend. Mr. Nelson has told me of the conditions surrounding the traveling and securing of transportation facilities by the blind accompanied by such "seeing eye" dogs.

Some of the railroad companies, motor-bus companies, and other carriers have adopted rules and regulations in accordance with which they do transport the blind passenger and the guide dog, but some of the transportation systems do not permit the blind and their dogs to travel as regular passengers and require them to ride in the baggage cars or not at all. It is hoped that my bill, which permits the dog to be carried free of extra fare, will result in uniform rules and regulations being put into effect by all the railroads, the Pullman Co. and carriers, so that no discrimination will be practiced against the blind and their guide dogs and that they will be accorded the same accommodations and service as the more fortunate passengers who have their sight.

When the hearings were held, four representatives of the railroads and the Pullman Co. were present and testified. They did not oppose the legislation and promised liberal cooperation in its proper enforcement. Dr. Heinz E. Claus, of Arlington, Va., accompanied by his guide dog named Rex, a shepherd dog from the Isle of Wight, off the coast of England, were the principal witnesses at the hearing, and it was the intelligence, friendliness, and clever antics of Rex which completely captivated the members of the committee and the battery of lawyers representing the railroads and resulted in favorable action being taken.

H. R. 6049 is sound meritorious legislation and will serve a very useful and humanitarian purpose. I trust that it will be promptly passed in the Senate and receive the approval of President Roosevelt.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE PRESENT ADMINISTRATION AND THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, last night I read in the Washington Evening Star three of the most amazing and startling articles of news I have ever read in any one edition of any paper. They are so startling that I think the attention of the House and the attention of the country should be called to these statements.

The first statement I refer to is one that comes from the Federal Treasury that the United States debt on June 15 amounts to $36,633,907,802, the largest amount in the history of the Nation, and about $20,500,000,000 more than the low point in 1930.

The article also states that on June 15, with only half a month of the fiscal year remaining, the current deficit is slightly over $2,900,000,000. This deficit is practically twice what the administration predicted it would be and it is amazingly near the amount of $3,000,000,000 that I have continually stated it would probably be on the 1st of July. This is certainly a startling situation and one that should be called to the attention of the country.

Another article that surprised me and caused me more or less consternation is a news item purported to be given out by Mordecai Ezekiel, one of the most trusted, economic advisers of this administration. It is headed "Too Much Thrift Contributes to Depression." He is quoted as saying:

> In times of prosperity too much of the Nation's income is devoted to savings and too little to spending on current consumption.

I certainly regret it, if the time has come in America when the people should be advised by high authorities in the administration that the day of saving to take care of yourself and your family in their old age is at an end. I am not in accord with this kind of philosophy, and I do not believe the honest-thinking, hard-working people of this country believe in that policy.

In addition to this, in the same paper, is another statement attributed to Secretary Wallace, one of the closest advisers of the administration. This article is headed " 'Individual gone,' asserts Secretary Wallace, 'it is the day of mass welfare—never mind tradition.' "

This is the thought of the speech of Secretary Wallace delivered to the encampment of the 4-H clubs here in Washington.

I think it is pretty sad when a high dignitary of the Government states to young men assembled here in Washington that the day of individual thrift is gone and that we are preparing to be a mass organization. I have stated a good many times on the floor of the House and publicly that it seemed to me the aim of the administration, through its continual waste and extravagance, is eventually to destroy the financial system of this Government.

I have also thought that the aim of the present administration, as shown by its various statements and acts, has been the direct purpose of regimenting the people of the United States and putting into effect here a planned economy, and eventually it would be easy to sovietize this great country of ours.

To me these are facts that are staring the American people in the face at the present time, and it is time for them to wake up and take note of what is happening here in Washington. [Applause.]

THE INDIAN POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, June 15, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] addressed the House on the subject of legislation affecting the Indians of the United States and then extended his remarks, including what might be termed a historical review of the Government's dealings with certain tribes of Indians.

At the outset the gentleman from Montana stated—and I quote his language:

> In view of the fact that there are several bills pending in the House affecting the rights of Indians and amending existing statutes conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims in order to give relief to Indians heretofore denied the same, and in view of the fact that apparently there is a feeling of prejudice entertained by some of the Members of the House toward these proposed measures, I feel that a few words in connection with the relationship between the Government of the United States and the Indians and their rights would not be out of place.

For one to be prejudiced toward a measure I take it that he or she would have formed an opinion or judgment beforehand or without examination of the bill or resolution.

As one who has consistently opposed the passage of legislation affecting Indians where I felt that the bill or resolution was not justified, I want to assure the gentleman from Montana, as well as the Members of the House, that in no case have I opposed any legislation without either carefully examining the bill or resolution, and in practically every case I have secured a report from the Comptroller General of the United States.

When the gentleman from Montana has been in Congress a little longer I do not feel that he will be accusing his colleagues of being biased or opposing legislation without considering the merits of the proposal presented. The gentleman will likewise find that there are some Members of Congress who have duties to perform that are not altogether pleasant, but their positions in the organization of the House requires them to assume the attitude that they do.

There are about 20 bills or resolutions on the calendar at the present time reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I have either secured reports concerning the measures or I have requested the reports.

For the information of the gentleman from Montana, who was not here at previous sessions of Congress, permit me to say that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I am chairman, held a hearing at the suggestion of Government officials in order that the facts might be disclosed relative to the status of Indian claims. At that hearing there were representatives of the Department of Justice who were charged with the responsibility of defending the Government in suits before the Court of Claims and also representatives of the Comptroller General's Office who are required to assemble the evidence used by the Department of Justice in protecting the interests of the Government. The hearing disclosed that up to that date Congress had referred by resolution to the Court of Claims 114 separate cases authorizing the Court of Claims to determine whether or not the Indians were entitled to reimbursement from the Government for lands, and so forth, that were formerly in their possession. The evidence further disclosed that the attorneys for the Indians had filed petitions with the Court of Claims, and up to that time the total amount involved being three and one-quarter billion of dollars.

The committee was advised the Department was practically helpless unless some legislation was passed that would protect the interest of the Government. As a result of the hearing and by direction of the committee, I placed the facts before the Committee on Appropriations and an amendment was included in a deficiency bill which in part extended to the Government the right to offset the claims of the Indians by showing gratuities and advances that had been made by the Government to the various tribes that had instituted suits in the Court of Claims. As a result of that amendment, untold millions of dollars have been saved to taxpayers of this country. Some of the suits have been dismissed, but the great majority are still pending, and in some cases judgment has been rendered against the Government.

For instance, on June 1, 1937, the Court of Claims handed down an opinion holding the Shoshone Tribe of Indians of the Wind River Reservation of Wyoming was entitled to $4,408,444.23 and of this amount $1,581,889.50 is to bear interest at the rate of 5 percent per annum from that date. The court allowed as an offset in this case, $1,956,233.58 and had it not been for the amendment in the deficiency bill, the judgment would have been $6,364,677.91. Just to show what the Congress is doing in submitting the cases to the Court of Claims, it might be proper to say that this claim in part was allowed under the treaty signed in 1863. In some of the cases referred to the Court of Claims, treaties that were signed with the Indians as far back as 1790 are involved. There is absolutely no limitation as to how far back the attorneys for the Indians can go.

There is one case pending before the Court of Claims at the present time where the attorneys have asked an amount in excess of $250,000,000. In another case, the General Accounting Office has been working for years trying to secure evidence to protect the Government and has spent nearly $200,000 in examining records and are still working on the case. Practically every resolution passed by the Congress giving jurisdiction to the Court of Claims in the cases referred to was passed without any objection whatsoever.

I am prepared to submit arguments to the House in connection with pending legislation that I feel will warrant the defeat of the majority of the bills and resolutions on the calendar.

On next Wednesday the Indian Affairs Committee will have the call and no doubt some of this legislation will be under consideration, and the Members of the House should give careful consideration to the bills and resolutions before casting their vote.

The gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] has made several arguments in the House since he became a Member last January in regard to one bill which he introduced and which he reported. That bill provides there shall be reimbursed through the United States Treasury and placed to the credit of certain tribes $3,373,580, and the bill further provides that this money shall be available for such expenditures for the benefit of the tribes as the Congress may hereafter direct. The gentleman from Montana would lead us to believe by his argument that this is simply a bookkeeping transaction, but the fact of the matter is it takes this amount of the taxpayers' money out of the general fund in the Treasury and credits it to various Indian tribes. If that bill becomes a law there will follow another bill to distribute the money among the Indians. That is no bookkeeping transaction.

There is a bill on the calendar which would repeal the amendment in the deficiency act which to some extent is protecting the Government and assisting the Department of Justice to contest the old claims. If that bill should ever become a law, the Government would be practically helpless in defending the suits. There are other bills amending the jurisdictional acts that referred the cases to the Court of Claims, and the claims are so old that again the Government would be absolutely helpless, and in one report that I submitted in the last session it showed that the Government would be required to confess judgment for approximately $17,000,000. That bill failed to pass, as I prevented its consideration.

I could go on indefinitely and refer to the bills and resolutions, but I think the proper time to do so is when they are called up in the House.

I have insisted for a number of years that it is the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs before reporting legislation to secure a statement from the Comptroller General, because it is the Comptroller General that has the records, and not the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Department of the Interior. For instance, about 2 years ago there was a bill called up providing for the appropriation of money to reimburse an Indian tribe inviting attention to a judgment rendered against the Government. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommended the passage of that bill. When the measure was under consideration I read an act of Congress passed in 1878 showing that the money had been appropriated and paid under that act of Congress and the attorneys were paid. The author of the bill, of course, withdrew it when I submitted that statement, but the Commissioner of Indian Affairs evidently had not taken the time to find out whether or not the claim had ever been paid.

Two bills have been reported by the committee to reimburse certain Indian tribes, and it is admitted in both instances that this money has already been paid by the Government, and that the attorneys for the Indians have also been paid, but the sponsors of the legislation maintain that certain Indians who were entitled to the money did not receive it. They ask the Government—and when I say "Government" I mean the taxpayers; your constituents and mine—to pay this claim a second time.

There is a bill on the calendar known as the Indian Claims Commission Act which, if it became a law, would provide for the creation of a commission to be composed of a chief commissioner and two associate commissioners, one of whom shall be an Indian. This commission would have the power to investigate all claims of whatever nature. It further provides that the attorneys representing Indians in all claims now pending in the Court of Claims, as well as any claim previously referred by Congress to the Court of Claims and not yet filed in such court, may be transferred to this commission for its investigation and report to Congress. It also provides that the commission shall be authorized to receive claims of all kinds affecting the Indians for the period of 5 years after the approval of the act.

This bill, Senate 1902, has already passed the Senate and been favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House. A member of the Indian Affairs Committee advised me that there were only seven members of the committee present at the time this important bill was reported, and that he thought he had an understanding that no action would be taken on the bill during his absence.

It would take pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to review the claims that are now before the court, as well as the bills and resolutions now pending in the House and Senate.

The gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR], in his extension of remarks, refers specifically to Senate Joint Resolution 55, which is identical to House Joint Resolution 177—

> To amend the act of July 3, 1926, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Crow Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes."

Now, what are the facts in reference to this claim? I have gone into the case with extreme care and for the benefit of the Members I present the following argument which cannot be assailed.

Section 1 of the act of July 3, 1926, supra, which these resolutions propose to amend, reads as follows:

> That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitations, to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment in any and all claims arising under or growing out of the treaty of Fort Laramie, dated September 17, 1851 (Second Kappler, p. 594), between the United States and the Crow Indian Nation and the treaty dated May 7, 1868 (15 Stats., p. 649), between the United States and the Crow Indian Nation, or arising under or growing out of the Executive order dated July 2, 1873 (First Kappler, p. 855), or any subsequent Executive order, the act of Congress approved April 15, 1874 (18 Stats., p. 28), or any subsequent act of Congress or agreement with said Crow Indian Nation, which said Crow Indian Nation or any branch thereof may have against the United States, which claims have not heretofore been determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the said courts to determine whether or not any provision in any such treaty or Executive order has been violated or breached by any act or acts of Congress or by any treaty made by the United States with any other Indian tribe or nation, and, if so, to render judgment for the damages resulting therefrom.

Pursuant to the foregoing act, the Crow Nation or Tribe of Indians filed in the Court of Claims on June 13, 1927, petition no. H–248, which petition was forwarded to the General Accounting Office by the Department of Justice with the request for a report thereon. In accordance therewith the Comptroller on October 11, 1929, rendered a report which was compiled in answer to the contentions set out in the petition, insofar as an examination of the records of his office disclosed.

The Court of Claims rendered its decision in the Crow case March 4, 1935, and in dismissing the petition stated in its opinion:

> The amount of the set-offs shown in the findings so far exceeds all other claims that, even if these claims were allowed, no recovery could be had.

The proposed joint resolutions, which are identical, would amend section 1 of the original Jurisdictional Act of July 3, 1926, to read as follows:

> That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal (not by writ of certiorari) to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitations, to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment on the merits in any and all claims arising under or growing out of the treaty of Fort Laramie, dated September 17, 1851 (Fourth Kappler, p. 1065), between the United States and the Crow Indian Nation, and the treaty dated May 7, 1868 (15 Stat. 649), between the United States and the Crow Indians of Montana, or arising under or growing out of the agreement between the River Crow Tribe of Indians and the United States, dated July 15, 1868 (Third Kappler, p. 714); the Executive order dated July 2, 1873 (First Kappler, p. 855), or any subsequent Executive order; the act of Congress approved April 15, 1874 (18 Stat. 28), or any subsequent act of Congress or agreement with said Crow Indian Nation, including claims growing out of any cessions of land by said Indians to the United States for an inadequate consideration under mistake of fact, irrespective of any treaty stipulation entered into under such mistake of fact, which said Crow Indian Nation or any branch thereof may have against the United States, which claims have not heretofore been determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States. Jurisdiction also is hereby conferred upon the said courts to determine whether or not any provision in any such treaty agreement, Executive order, or act of Congress above set forth has been violated or breached by any act or acts of Congress or by any treaty made by the United States with any other Indian tribe or nation, and to render judgment for the damages resulting therefrom: Provided, That for complying with the terms of this joint resolution, case no. H–248, in the Court of Claims, entitled "The Crow Nation or Tribe of Indians of Montana v. The United States", decided on March 4, 1935, is hereby reinstated.

The italic portion of the foregoing quoted joint resolution would materially amend the original Jurisdictional Act of July 3, 1926, supra, and in this connection particular attention is invited to that part which reads:

> Including claims growing out of any cessions of land by said Indians to the United States for an inadequate consideration under mistake of fact, irrespective of any treaty stipulation entered into under such mistake of fact.

It would appear that this part of said joint resolution refers to an alleged claim for certain lands originally contained in the Crow Reservation set apart for their use pursuant to the Fort Laramie treaty of September 17, 1851, and ceded to the United States under the terms of the treaty of May 7, 1868 (15 Stat. 649). In the Court's opinion, The Crow Nation or Tribe of Indians of Montana v. The United States (81 Ct. Cls. 238), the following is stated with reference to this cession of land:

> The first claim is that for additional consideration for 30,530,764.8 acres of land taken over by the Government under the treaty of 1868, representing the amount by which plaintiff's reservation under the Fort Laramie treaty of September 17, 1851 (11 Stat. 749), was diminished by the treaty of 1868, which reduced the reservation to 8,000,409.2 acres. The plaintiff claims a failure of consideration through a mistake of fact, as to the ratification of the treaty of 1851, causing the Crow Indians to cede this large territory for an inadequate price. The claim is made for the difference amounting to some $30,000,000.
> However, under the jurisdictional act this court is confined to claims arising under and growing out of the 1851 treaty and the treaty of 1868; both of these treaties set out the consideration to be paid by the Government. Under the Constitution all treaties made under the authority of the United States are the supreme law of the land, and the question of the amount of the consideration and what entered into the negotiations are not for this court to determine. Both are political and not judicial matters.

Under the provisions of the treaty of 1868 the United States agreed to expend sums of money for the benefit of the Crows for various periods and for various and special purposes, the indefinite amounts to be determined by the United States from time to time as contingencies and necessities should arise. In compliance with the obligations thus assumed, Congress disbursed for the benefit of the Crows $1,499,866.16. This amount was the consideration which went to the Crow Nation for the cession of the 30,000,000 acres delimited from the 1851 reservation. Both from a factual and jurisdictional standpoint, there can be no recovery on this claim.

The report of the General Accounting Office on Crow petition no. H-248, which was forwarded to the Department of Justice October 11, 1929, contained a complete accounting, pursuant to all treaties, agreements, and acts of Congress relating to said Indians during the period from September 17, 1851, to June 30, 1927, reflecting disbursements aggregating $11,638,395.51, of which $9,074,069.75 was disbursed for the direct benefit of the Crow Nation of Indians and $202,742.03 was disbursed for their benefit jointly with other Indians under treaty appropriations. Also included in said amount of $11,638,395.51 is $2,266,426.97, disbursed for the direct benefit of said Indians, and $95,156.76 disbursed for their benefit jointly with other Indians under gratuity—other than treaty—appropriations.

In view of the above, how can any Member assert that those who oppose this joint resolution entertain a feeling of prejudice? This joint resolution should not be passed, and it is my purpose to urge the House to defeat the resolution when it is called up.

I present this statement for the purpose of calling to the attention of the Members of the House the importance of this legislation and express the hope that on next Wednesday, June 23, when the bills and resolution are called up that Members will be on the floor to listen to the arguments so that they can vote intelligently when the roll is called.

(Mr. COCHRAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum and make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 92]

The SPEAKER. On this call 344 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The doors were opened.

TEMPORARY ENTRY OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7206) to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts' Silver Jubilee Camp to be held in the United States in 1937.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it proper to state that under the circumstances which have been presented to the Chair by the gentlewoman from New York, the Chair deemed it proper to recognize the gentlewoman to make this request. The bill is somewhat of an emergency nature and will take only a moment.

Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That alien Girl Guides and Girl Scouts participants, officials, and executives who are accredited members of delegations to the Silver Jubilee Camp to be held in the United States in 1937, all of whom are nonimmigrants, if otherwise admissible into the United States under the immigration laws, shall be exempted from payment of the tax of $8 prescribed by section 2 of the Immigration Act of 1917 and exempted from the fees prescribed by law to be collected in connection with executing an application for a visa and visaing the passport or other travel document of an alien for the purpose of entering the United States as a nonimmigrant, and such aliens shall not be required to present official passports issued by the governments to which they owe allegiance: Provided, That aliens shall be in possession of official Girl Guide or Girl Scout identity cards issued by their own governments or issued by the World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts indicating their Girl Guide or Girl Scout status and nationality, and duly visaed without charge by American consular officers abroad: And provided further, That such aliens shall comply with regulations not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions which shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor and Secretary of State: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall relieve an alien from being required to obtain a gratis nonimmigration visa if coming to the United States as a nonimmigrant, or an immigration visa if coming to the United States as an immigrant.

SEC. 2. That such aliens shall be permitted free entry of their personal effects and their equipments to be used in connection with the Silver Jubilee Camp, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, following the disposition of business allocated for that day, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the disposition of all legislative matters, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] may address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I shall not object, but I remind the gentleman that separate votes have been asked on the bill before the House at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not recognize any other gentleman for any purpose until after we dispose of the unfinished business. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

FATHER'S DAY—ITS ORIGIN, AND A PLEA FOR CONGRESSIONAL RECOGNITION

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, this Congress has, by a joint resolution heretofore enacted, set aside a certain Sunday in each year to be known as Mother's Day. There are millions of American sons and daughters who likewise feel that a certain day should be set aside for Father's Day.

In 1910, through the efforts, energy, and tireless activity of Mrs. John Bruce Dodd, a constituent of mine, of Spokane, Wash., many city, county, and State officials recognized the significance and importance of having a day on which, throughout the Nation, tribute would be paid to the fathers of America. Now, by common consent, the third Sunday in June is recognized as Father's Day. In order that the people of America may know and in order that proper recognition may be given to Mrs. Dodd for what she and her associates did to bring about a recognition of this day, I am making this brief statement. I do it, too, in the hope that shortly there will be enacted by joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, a formal designation of the third Sunday in June of each year when America will pause long enough to pay homage and respect to the fathers of America.

I desire to make as a part of my remarks the brief resolution recently adopted by the International Father's Day Association of Spokane, Wash., and the American Legion Auxiliary, Unit No. 9, of Spokane, Wash. This resolution has been forwarded to me by Mrs. T. H. Petersen and Mrs. Emilie Pearson, both of Spokane, Wash., who are the legislative chairmen of their respective organizations, and it is as follows:

Joint resolution designating the third Sunday of June as Father's Day, and for other purposes

Whereas by joint resolution the Congress of the United States has designated and set aside a certain Sunday of each year to be known as Mother's Day; and

Whereas Father's Day was founded in Spokane, Wash., in the year 1910 by formal petition presented by Mrs. John Bruce Dodd and endorsed and sponsored by many State, county, and city officials, besides numerous civic and patriotic organizations; and

Whereas this day, founded and promoted in the city of Spokane by Mrs. Dodd and her associates, has become national through popular acclaim; and

Whereas there is a spirit of restlessness among the young people of the land, and the example and the memory of the American father, both in civic life and in the home, are the highest value in the training of American youth; and

Whereas the formation of sturdy American character, the emulation of and the respect for the ideals of our fathers are imperative to direct interests of our Government; and

Whereas the third Sunday of June, now known as Father's Day, a day designated by its founder to point out the father's place in the home, the training of children, the safeguarding of the family fireside, the protection of womanhood and childhood, whether its meaning is regarded in the light of religion or of patriotism, its value is so apparent as to need no argument in behalf of such a day; and

Whereas be it

Resolved by the commissioners of the city of Spokane, in the State of Washington, assembled, That the mayor of Spokane is hereby authorized and directed to issue a proclamation calling upon the city officials to display the flag of the United States on all civic buildings, and that the people of the city be urged to display the flag at their homes or other suitable places; also that the rose, the flower designated in the original Father's Day petition, be worn in honor of fatherhood; and that such acts of affection and reverence as may be impelled by the devotion of the individual be participated in as an expression of gratitude and loyalty to father and as an emphasis upon the sacred significance of Father's Day.

I consider it an honor and a distinction to represent the congressional district where this splendid idea had its origin, and it is a pleasure in this manner to call the Nation's attention to that fact and to recognize Mrs. Dodd and her associates, not alone for bringing the idea into being but, in addition, for keeping it alive throughout the years and making it a factor in our national life.

The inspiration that gave rise to this day in the mind and heart of Mrs. Dodd is best expressed in the words of one of her friends, which are:

Thirty-seven years ago, in the Big Bend hills of the State of Washington, the day had its nativity in a lonely farm dwelling. There sorrow ministered amid the moaning of the March winds.

A father sat with bowed heat in his aloneness. About him clung his weeping children. The winds outside threw great scarves of powdered snow against the windowpanes, when suddenly the last-born tore himself from the group and rushed out into the storm, calling for his mother. Yet even his baby voice could not penetrate the great silence that held his mother.

Hurriedly the father gathered him back to his protection, and for more than two decades William Jackson Smart, alone, kept paternal vigilance over his motherless children.

This poignant experience in the life of Mrs. John Bruce Dodd, of Spokane, Wash., who was then Sonora Louise Smart, was the inspiration for Father's Day, which materialized through the devotion of this father and the father of her own son, John Bruce, Jr., born in 1909. Through the observance of the love and the sacrifice of fathers about her everywhere, her idea of Father's Day crystallized in 1910 through a formal Father's Day petition asking recognition of fatherhood.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TAX BILL

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the further consideration of H. R. 7472, to provide additional revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. The previous question has been ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], on page 29 of the bill, line 9. Also I demand a separate vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], on page 44, line 13, of the bill.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIES. The first amendment is in reference to the increase in the gift and inheritance tax in the District, and the second amendment is in reference to the chain-store tax. Is not that correct?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not acquainted with the text of the amendments. They would have to be reported by the Clerk. Is a separate vote demanded upon any other amendment?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendment striking out section 9, which carried the income tax and substituted therefor a tax on real estate.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first Dies amendment, on page 29 of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to report the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NICHOLS. Would it be in order to propound a unanimous-consent request ath the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. It would, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. It is a very lengthy amendment, and will take considerable time of the House to read it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I shall not object to the discontinuance of the further reading, but I think the gentleman should state in about 10 words just what it is and then the House will know definitely what it is voting on.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is an amendment to the gift and inheritance feature of the bill. The committee reported a flat tax, which it deemed would raise sufficient money to carry on the business of the government of the District of Columbia. This amendment simply provides that the tax be put on a graduated basis, starting low in the lower brackets and going on up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Is it not a fact that all this amendment does is to begin with 1 percent, as provided by the committee, and graduate one-half percent up for each $10,000 until you get to the $100,000 bracket? Then a flat 10 percent is put on from $100,000 to $200,000. After $200,000, 15 percent.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, I will say, since the gentleman has asked the question, that that is right, but the committee is afraid——

Mr. DIES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. NICHOLS. I am answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. DIES. I am not asking the gentleman's opinion. I am asking him if that is not what the amendment provides?

Mr. NICHOLS. I am not sure that that is what the amendment provides.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that it may be printed in the RECORD? The Chair will state that the full amendment was printed in the RECORD on page 5930.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIES: Page 29, line 9, strike out all after the word "decedent", down to and including line 21, and insert the following: "shall be subject to a tax on the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $5,000, at the following rates:

"(1) Two percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $5,000, but not in excess of $15,000.

"(2) Two and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $15,000, but not in excess of $25,000.

"(3) Three percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $25,000, but not in excess of $35,000.

"(4) Three and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $35,000, but not in excess of $45,000.

"(5) Four percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $45,000, but not in excess of $55,000.

"(6) Four and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $55,000, but not in excess of $65,000.

"(7) Five percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $65,000, but not in excess of $75,000.

"(8) Five and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $75,000, but not in excess of $85,000.

"(9) Six percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $85,000, but not in excess of $100,000.

"(10) Ten percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $100,000, but not in excess of $200,000.

"(11) Fifteen percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $200,000.

"(B) So much of said property as is in excess of $2,000 so transferred to each of the brothers, sisters, nephews, and nieces of the whole or half blood of the decedent shall be subject to a tax at the following rates:

"(1) Three percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $2,000, but not in excess of $12,000.

"(2) Three and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $12,000, but not in excess of $22,000.

"(3) Four percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $22,000, but not in excess of $32,000.

"(4) Four and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $32,000, but not in excess of $42,000.

"(5) Five percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $42,000, but not in excess of $52,000.

"(6) Five and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $52,000, but not in excess of $62,000.

"(7) Six percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $62,000, but not in excess of $72,000.

"(8) Six and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $72,000, but not in excess of $82,000.

"(9) Seven percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $82,000, but not in excess of $100,000.

"(10) Eleven percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $100,000, but not in excess of $200,000.

"(11) Sixteen percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $200,000.

"(C) So much of said property as is in excess of $1,000, so transferred to each of the grandnephews and grandnieces of the decedent and all persons other than those included in paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section, and all firms, institutions, associations, and corporations, shall be subject to a tax at the following rates:

"(1) Five percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $1,000 but not in excess of $11,000.

"(2) Five and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $11,000 but not in excess of $21,000.

"(3) Six percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $21,000 but not in excess of $31,000.

"(4) Six and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $31,000 but not in excess of $41,000.

"(5) Seven percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $41,000 but not in excess of $51,000.

"(6) Seven and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $51,000 but not in excess of $61,000.

"(7) Eight percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $61,000 but not in excess of $71,000.

"(8) Eight and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $71,000 but not in excess of $81,000.

"(9) Nine percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $81,000 but not in excess of $91,000.

"(10) Nine and one-half percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $91,000 but not in excess of $100,000.

"(11) Twelve percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $100,000 but not in excess of $200,000.

"(12) Seventeen percent of so much of the clear value of such property so transferred to each such beneficiary as is in excess of $200,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were ayes 153 and noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment upon which a separate vote was demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIES: Page 44, line 13, after the word "Commissioners", insert "Provided, however, That upon stores or mercantile establishments operated in the District of Columbia and belonging to a chain or group having more than one store, an annual license fee shall be paid for each store operated in the District of Columbia, as follows:

"(1) $10 for each retail store or business in excess of one but not in excess of five.

"(2) $15 for each retail store or business in excess of 5 but not in excess of 10.

"(3) $20 for each retail store or business in excess of 10 but not in excess of 15.

"(4) $50 for each retail store or business in excess of 15 but not in excess of 25.

"(5) $75 for each retail store or business in excess of 25 but not in excess of 30.

"(6) $100 for each retail store or business in excess of 30 but not in excess of 50.

"(7) $550 for each retail store or business in excess of 50.

"It is further provided that this annual license fee shall be based on the number of stores or mercantile establishments included under the same general management, supervision, ownership, or control, whether operated in the District of Columbia or not."

During the reading of the amendment the following occurred:

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were ayes 131 and noes 53.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland: Strike out all of title IX and insert a new title IX, as follows:

"TITLE IX—TAX ON TANGIBLE PROPERTY

"For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, the rate of taxation imposed for the District of Columbia on real and tangible personal property shall not be less than 1.7 percent on the assessed value of said property."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to explain the amendment?

Mr. NICHOLS. I just want to explain what the amendment is. That is all.

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, title IX of this bill as reported out of committee was a provision for the imposition of an income tax in the District of Columbia. By a committee amendment title IX was stricken from the bill and then an amendment to title IX was offered in the form of a new title IX, which provided for the fixing of an increase in the real-estate tax of 20 cents a hundred, which would now make the real-estate tax under the amendment at $1.70 per hundred instead of $1.50 per hundred. That is the committee amendment on which we are voting.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to inform the House of the fact that if you vote for the amendment it means that you oppose an income tax and favor an increase in the realty tax. If you vote in opposition to the amendment it means that you favor retaining in the bill an income tax, and you are against an increase in the realty tax.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DIRKSEN) there were ayes 187 and noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for these 5 minutes to thank the subcommittee who held long and serious hearings on the bill that has just been passed, to thank them for the hours they spent on this bill, and to say to them and to you that I regret very much that I was not here to do my part as chairman of the committee to assist in the passage of this bill. I believe that there are many parts of the bill much misunderstood, and I am confident that if the House knew the weeks that were spent in considering the bill, they would have had at least a little more sympathy for the subcommittee and for the members of the District Committee who gave their time to report a bill that I fear is very much misunderstood and very little appreciated in the House.

I have been serving for 6 years as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. During these 6 years I have had a great deal of cooperation from the people in the District. I think that, by and large, the press of Washington has treated the District Committee very fairly, but for some unknown reason that is difficult to explain it seems that whenever the District Committee comes to the floor with a bill there are certain Members who never take any interest in the District until bills come before the House and then they find fault without realizing just what it means to the District Committee and to the people of the District.

Now, my dear colleagues, I do not mean this as a criticism of those who have stood with us in our legislation, and there are very many of you who have. I deeply appreciate the support that I have had from a large group in this House, but there are just a few destructive forces that seem to scent something to find fault with every time the District Committee appears with its bills on the floor. You know, and I know, that the work we do in the District does not help us at home; in fact, I doubt if the people at home ever know anything about what we do in the District of Columbia. Service on this committee is purely patriotic. Unfortunately we are obliged to act for American citizens who are denied the right to act for themselves. The District people must depend upon us, and I sincerely hope that some day you will join with me in giving the District a little more power to govern itself. I know that there has been a great deal of objection to granting the vote to the residents of the District of Columbia, but I do think that the time has come to enact legislation that would give those responsible for the District, the Commissioners, the power at least to pass ordinances usually passed by a city council in any city of these United States. Were such a bill to pass we would not take up the time of the House bringing in bills that are of no importance whatsoever to anybody but to the people of the District. I hope that the day will come, and that I shall be here when it does come, when we shall give the people of the District some of the advantages they should have and to which they are entitled by reason of the taxes they pay to support their city government.

I want again to express my sincere appreciation to the committee for the work it has done this week on this bill. It was not pleasant work I understand, and I am sorry that circumstances prevented my being here to assist in the consideration of the bill. I was called home by the death of someone very dear to me, a beloved aunt, who had been a mother to me during my youth. It was impossible for me to be here, but I do want you to know how deeply I appreciate all that you have done for the District and assure the Members who have stood with the committee and helped to pass this bill that I deeply appreciate your efforts and your fine loyalty to me.

Thank you very much. [Applause.]

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Concurrent Resolution No. 18.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 18

Concurrent resolution to authorize and direct the Clerk of the House, in the enrollment of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1938 (H. R. 4064), to make a change in the text of the appropriation for pensions under the Veterans' Administration

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H. R. 4064, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes", the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to insert in the fourth paragraph, under the caption "Veterans' Administration", after the word "Administration", the following additional matter: "accruing during the fiscal year 1938 or in prior fiscal years."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this merely corrects some language in the appropriation for the Veterans' Administration to cover a point raised by the Comptroller General which permits them to make payments in the same manner in which they have already been doing it. It comes unanimously from the Appropriations Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DEDICATION OF WORLD WAR MEMORIALS IN EUROPE

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution No. 415, making an appropriation to defray expenses incident to the dedication of chapels and other World War memorials erected in Europe, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this resolution contain an amendment giving permission amongst the "other purposes" for the purchase of nine airplanes for W. P. A. to fly all over the country?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not exactly as the gentleman states.

Mr. RICH. W. P. A. has been flying high. If we adopt this resolution containing, as I understand it does, an amendment for the purchase of these airplanes, then the W. P. A. officials would fly still higher.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of providing for the dedication of the chapels and other World War memorials erected in Europe under the authority of the act of March 4, 1923 (42 Stat. 1509), there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $175,000, to remain available until June 30, 1938, and to be available for expenditure by the American Battle Monuments Commission for such objects and in such manner as the Commission may deem necessary and proper to accomplish the purposes hereof without regard to the provisions of other laws or regulations relating to the expenditure of public funds except that this exemption shall not be construed as waiving the requirement for the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit. The Commission may utilize the services, materials, supplies, equipment, and other facilities of any other agency of the Government when, in the discretion of such other agency, it is convenient and practicable to furnish the same, the cost thereof to be paid from this appropriation, except that when, in the discretion of the furnishing agency, the public interest will be subserved thereby such services, materials, supplies, equipment, and other facilities may be furnished free of charge to the Commission. The Commission may, within such limits and under such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, delegate to its chairman, secretary, or other designated representatives such of its authority as it may deem necessary and proper in carrying out the purposes hereof. The official delegation designated by the Commission to attend such dedication shall include three Members of the United States Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President or the President pro tempore of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce, to transfer, during the fiscal year 1937, from the appropriation "Salaries and general expenses for the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, fiscal year 1937", to the appropriation "Departmental salaries, Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, fiscal year 1937", not to exceed $8,000.

SEC. 3. There is hereby transferred from the appropriation "Fees of jurors and witnesses, United States courts, 1937" to the appropriation "Pay of special assistant attorneys, United States courts, 1937", the amount of $40,000.

SEC. 4. The appropriation in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1938 (Public Act No. 94, 75th Cong.), for an assistant clerk at $2,800 for the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, is hereby amended to make the salary of such assistant clerk read "$2,880."

With the following committee amendment:

"SEC. 5. The Comptroller General of the United States is directed to approve payment for nine airplanes obtained from the Stinson Aircraft Corporation, Wayne, Mich., under contract Cc-2510, dated October 1, 1936, out of an allotment of $83,000 made by the President of the United States on March 23, 1937, for this purpose from the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman from Virginia explain the resolution briefly?

Mr. WOODRUM. I shall be very glad to, and for that purpose I ask recognition, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution simply takes care of a few emergency matters coming from the Appropriations Committee. I may say that the committee will have the third deficiency bill ready very soon and has already held hearings on a number of items, but is holding the bill up in the hope that we will get the green light pretty soon in order to get the last appropriation bill out of the way.

These are emergency matters, however, that are of purely a deficiency nature and must be taken care of before the 1st of July.

The first section of the bill authorizes an appropriation for the dedication of the monuments and markers in the cemeteries of Europe which have been erected by the Battle Monuments Commission. As you may recall, we have spent about four and a half million dollars for the erection of some very beautiful, worthy, and representative monuments, markers, and chapels in the cemeteries of Europe where 30,000 American boys sleep as a result of the World War. These monuments have been completed and are now ready for dedication, and this $175,000 is for that purpose.

Near Sommepy, France: Commemorates services of Second, Thirty-sixth, Forty-second, and Ninety-third Divisions in operations with the French in the Champagne region of France.

Tours, France: Commemorates services of supply of the American Expeditionary Forces.

Near Vierstraat, Belgium: Commemorates services of Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth Divisions in the vicinity of Vierstraat.

In addition to these memorials, the Commission has placed a small bronze tablet at Chaumont, France, to mark the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces, and another at Souilly, France, to mark the headquarters of the American First Army during the World War.

CEMETERIES—NUMBER OF BURIALS

Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, near Belleau, France: This cemetery is the burial place of 2,288 Americans, most of whom lost their lives in the vicinity of Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry in the Aisne-Marne salient during the operations of June and early July 1918.

Somme American Cemetery, near Bony, France: This cemetery is the burial place of 1,833 Americans, most of whom were members of the First, Twenty-seventh, Thirtieth, Thirty-third, and Eightieth Divisions. Many of those who sleep here gave their lives in the offensive which broke the Hindenburg Line in September 1918.

Brookwood American Cemetery, Brookwood, England: This cemetery is the burial place of 463 Americans, most of whom died in Great Britain or who lost their lives in its surrounding waters during the World War.

Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, near Fere-en-Tardenois, France: This cemetery is the burial place of 6,012 Americans, most of whom lost their lives in the region during the operations of July and August 1918.

Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, near Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, France: This cemetery is the burial place of 14,238 Americans, most of whom lost their lives in the Meuse-Argonne operation.

Suresnes American Cemetery, Suresnes (near Paris), France: This cemetery contains the graves of 1,541 Americans. While most of those who sleep here died in hospitals in the rear zones of France, many of them had been wounded in battle and died after being evacuated to these hospitals.

St. Mihiel American Cemetery, near Thiaucourt, France: This cemetery is the burial place of 4,152 Americans, most of whom lost their lives in the operations which began September 12 and ended September 16, 1918.

Flanders Field American Cemetery, near Waereghem, Belgium: This cemetery is the burial place of 368 Americans, most of whom gave their lives in helping free Belgium from the Germans.

DATES OF DEDICATION

The chapels in the American cemeteries in France were dedicated on May 30, 1937, and the dates fixed for the dedication of the other chapels and memorials are as follows: August 1, Sunday, Montfaucon; August 2, Monday, Montsec; August 3, Tuesday, Sommepy; August 5, Thursday, Tours; August 8 (a. m.), Sunday, chapel, Flanders Field Cemetery; August 8 (p. m.), Sunday, Audenarde; August 8 (p. m.), Sunday, Vierstraat; August 9 (a. m.), Monday, Bellicourt; August 9 (p. m.), Monday, Cantigny; August 12, Thursday, Brest; August 15, Sunday, chapel, Brookwood Cemetery; October, date to be fixed, Château-Thierry.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman go into more particulars as to the expenditure of the $175,000? Does that include the erection of additional monuments?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. That is purely to cover the cost of the dedication ceremonies.

Mr. FISH. Is that not a rather large sum of money just for dedication ceremonies?

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman that it is a large undertaking. There are 12 or 15 monuments and chapels at different points in France and Belgium and it is proposed to send the Battle Monuments Commission, of which General Pershing is chairman, a small delegation from Congress of three Members from each body, and some distinguished gentlemen who held official positions at the time of the World War.

Mr. FISH. If we sent 20 delegates at the cost of $1,000 apiece that would account for $20,000. I am trying to find out how all the rest of the money is to be spent.

Mr. WOODRUM. The committee has gone into the matter very carefully with the Battle Monuments Commission. Of course, in the very nature of things it is almost impossible to tell with any degree of accuracy just exactly what this is going to cost, but it is necessary to go to each of these cemeteries and monuments and do quite a good deal of construction work in the way of building grandstands and accommodations. There is also the matter of transportation over there from one place to another, which is quite an item. It will be necessary to have some additional clerk hire for this celebration. They are expecting large representations from the veterans' organizations of America to go abroad. The $175,000 included in this resolution is a liberal allowance, I may say to the gentleman, but I do not think it is too much. I may also say to the gentleman that my subcommittee has handled this appropriation of the Battle Monuments Commission all the way through the construction period. That Commission has done a grand job and it has not squandered any money. I am willing to let them have enough money to do this in a creditable way.

Mr. FISH. Is there an item in there of approximately $40,000 for pictures, publicity, radio, and matters of that kind?

Mr. WOODRUM. There is an item of $37,000 for sound pictures. The question came up as to whether or not the news weeklies would not be glad to take pictures of that, and the answer was "Yes"; of course they would take them. But what they do is to take a shot here and a shot there. The Battle Monuments Commission felt, and the committee agreed with them, that this matter was of sufficient importance and dignity that a fairly comprehensive sound picture should be made of the ceremonies to be had at each of those places. It was felt more pictures should be taken than would be had by the news-reel pictures.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman think we really need $37,000 to take sound pictures in these cemeteries? We are dedicating the cemeteries that exist over there and will exist for years to come. These are not war pictures. They are merely snapshots of cemeteries. It seems to me this is a very large appropriation, $37,000, to take moving pictures of cemeteries.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I say to the gentleman there is no way of telling just exactly what it will cost. I do not believe it will cost that much. I do not think the Battle Monuments Commission will let it cost a penny more than it should cost.

Mr. FISH. Is anything included for an international radio hook-up?

Mr. WOODRUM. Nothing. The radio will be free.

Mr. FISH. The radio will be free?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is my understanding.

Mr. FISH. No money may be taken out of this appropriation for radio purposes? I ask this question as it has been intimated to me that these funds might be used to pay for an international radio hook-up for the President at the expense of the taxpayers and the United States Treasury.

Mr. WOODRUM. No.

Mr. FISH. I am glad to have this assurance. Naturally, as a veteran, I want to do what is right and I do not want to oppose any appropriation that the committee has gone into carefully and thinks advisable.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman I was beginning to wonder and I was somewhat confused as to the gentleman's attitude. The gentleman has always been such a stanch advocate of veterans' legislation. His apparent attitude as to the propriety of the expenditure of necessary funds to make these ceremonies dignified was confusing to me. I am glad to have the gentleman's assurance that this ought to be done in a proper way.

Mr. FISH. It ought to be done in a proper and dignified way, but I look with some suspicion on that item of $37,000 for moving pictures of those cemeteries.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think it will cost that much.

Mr. FISH. As long as it does not include international broadcasting at ten or fifteen thousand dollars I will take the gentleman's word and support the resolution.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. In connection with the $37,000 that will be spent for sound pictures, will the Federal Government have any part or rights in the pictures? Will these pictures be sold in order to help defray this expense of $37,000? Or will some company get the benefits?

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman what I tried to say to the gentleman from New York, it is impossible to tell with any degree of nicety what it will cost to take sound pictures of these ceremonies. This is a rough estimate which General Pershing has given to us. It is merely for the purpose of recording the event in pictures as an historic incident, which I think is justified.

Mr. RICH. Are they going to give these sound pictures to some particular corporation, to reap a harvest at the expense of the taxpayers?

Mr. WOODRUM. No.

Mr. RICH. Or is the Government going to cash in on them?

Mr. WOODRUM. They will be under the control of the Battle Monuments Commission directly, and they will take care of them in an appropriate and dignified manner. Perhaps they will be kept for the archives of the Government.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think the taxpayers are going to be satisfied with the spending of this $175,000, if the Government does not do that?

Mr. WOODRUM. I imagine the taxpayers will be satisfied to have the event recorded in a dignified manner.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think the taxpayers will be perfectly satisfied when the Ways and Means Committee goes to the taxpayers and tells them, "Now, we are going to raise $175,000, and you ought to be satisfied to have these sound pictures taken to be stored here in the Archives Building"? We should as a Congress show to our people that for each dollar we spend we have a dollar of value to the American people returned; it may not be tangible evidence, but it must be in some service rendered that is for the betterment of our people and our country.

Mr. WOODRUM. Does the gentleman think we ought to dedicate these monuments, or just let them stand over there?

Mr. RICH. I think we ought to dedicate the monuments, but I would like to know where you are going to get the money. Look at the jump in our national debt the past few days. On June 15 it is $36,633,907,802.90, an all-time high.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Am I correct in understanding General Pershing is at the head of this Commission and that he is the man who is responsible for these arrangements and for spending this money?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. It may be a further assurance to my friend if I remind him also that our former colleague, Judge Finis J. Garrett, is on the Commission and very actively and personally interested in it.

Mr. SNELL. I will trust the money to those two gentlemen.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Will the gentleman state for what term the members of the Commission are appointed, what length of time?

Mr. WOODRUM. So far as I know, at the will of the President until the matter is concluded. I do not think there is any definite time fixed for the term of a member.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Will the gentleman place in the RECORD a list of the monuments?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. I am going to ask permission to revise and extend my remarks and will put in that information.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. LUCE. I could not gather from the reading of the amendment whether Members of the Senate and the House are to become members of the Battle Monuments Commission.

Mr. WOODRUM. Not of the Commission. The resolution provides that three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate shall be appointed as members of the dedication delegation, to accompany the Battle Monuments Commission, and I will say for the RECORD that the gentleman from Virginia who is presenting the matter has no idea whom the Speaker will appoint beyond the fact that he will not be one of them.

Mr. LUCE. They would have no share in the spending of the money?

Mr. WOODRUM. No.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the independent offices appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 7, and 8 to the bill (H. R. 4064) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

C. A. WOODRUM,
JED JOHNSON,
JAMES M. FITZPATRICK,
GEO. W. JOHNSON,
JOHN M. HOUSTON,
R. B. WIGGLESWORTH,
EVERETT M. DIRKSEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

CARTER GLASS,
JAMES F. BYRNES,
RICHARD B. RUSSELL, Jr.,
FREDERICK STEIWER,
ALVA B. ADAMS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 5: Page 37, line 4, strike out "$9,500" and insert "$9,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the independent offices appropriation bill was the first appropriation bill passed by the House. The subcommittee handling the bill met here in December in order to conclude the bill and have it ready for early consideration by the House. The bill was considered and passed. Everything has been washed up in it except the items affecting the Social Security Board, and this concerns three amendments. The first is the amendment which has now been reported to the House, reducing the salary of the Executive Secretary of the Board from $9,500 to $9,000. In addition to this there is amendment no. 7 which puts all salaries under the Classification Act, and amendment no. 8, which provides that all experts and attorneys of the Board whose salaries are $5,000 or more shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is particularly amendment no. 8 which has had us in disagreement.

When we first brought the conference report back the House adopted an amendment and sent the bill back to the Senate providing for civil service for all these experts and attorneys. The Senate disagreed to that amendment, and as the matter now stands, the whole independent offices appropriation bill, including some 30 or 35 establishments therein represented together with the old-age benefits under the Social Security Board, is tied up with July 1 very near.

The question involved is this. The basic Social Security Act provided that the Social Security Board should have the right to appoint experts and attorneys without regard to the civil service. All the rest of the social-security organization is under strict civil service, and so far as I know that has been observed. There has been, though, a great deal of complaint, some of it with merit, as to the manner in which the so-called experts of the Social Security Board have been appointed.

Mr. O'MALLEY. And attorneys.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; and perhaps some of the attorneys. May I say parenthetically that the gentleman from Virginia who is presenting the matter does not have a single appointee at the Social Security Board, so is not interested in the matter at all, except from an academic standpoint.

The basic act provides the Board shall make such appointments, and the Board has made a great many of the appointments. It has been stated that some of the people appointed as experts have not even been citizens of the United States. It has also been stated others were appointed at salaries which were very much above those to which they would ordinarily be entitled.

The amendment which the Senate put in requires not only future appointments of attorneys and experts but all those already appointed to come up for appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate. This raises a pretty broad fundamental question of policy between the two Houses. So far as I am concerned today, I have no particular wishes which I desire to persuade the House to follow. I do want to get this conference report adopted. This is absolutely necessary, and it must be done.

I would like in just a word, if I may, to give you what I consider to be the two sides of the question, and then to yield to some of you if you wish to express yourselves. Of course, there is very strong argument against the proposition that we ought to begin to adopt a policy of permitting senatorial confirmation of all positions carrying salaries of over $5,000.

If this were to be the beginning of such a policy then I would never agree to its adoption by the House, but I have been repeatedly assured by responsible Members of the other body that should this amendment be agreed to, they will not regard it as a precedent, stating that because of the magnitude of the operations of the Social Security Board, because of the great number of high-salaried experts who have been appointed and because of the very widespread dissatisfaction over some of the appointments, some part of the Government should certainly have the right to review and pass upon the qualifications of those who have received these appointments. [Applause.] I am frank to say that this is an argument that has had considerable weight with me.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I happen to be one of the Members of the House who is not exactly satisfied with the administrative activities of the Social Security Board, particularly along the line of what the gentleman has just said with respect to observing civil-service requirements. In my district I inquired of 40 of the principal postmasters with respect to an examination that was supposed to have been held in September 1935, and not one of them had received any notice whatever of any examination for these positions, and may I inquire of the gentleman if he knows whether there was a civil-service examination held with respect to the qualifications of the people who are now in the Social Security Board?

Mr. WOODRUM. Does the gentleman refer to the experts?

Mr. MAY. Any of them.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I may say to the gentleman there have been several examinations held for the purpose of making up eligible lists for the Social Security Board, for instance, lists of local and district managers.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. I think that was held in September of last year.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Kentucky certainly did not mean to say that an examination was necessary to be held in 1935, because that was before the act was passed.

Mr. MAY. I meant in September of 1936, when they were supposed to have held an examination.

Mr. WOODRUM. There have been several qualifying examinations held for that part of the personnel required to be under civil service, and this provision does not affect that.

Mr. MAY. I may say as a matter of further information that there has not been a single appointee in my district who has not been sent to some other district, and I have been told by one of the Senators that he has inquired of over 100 postmasters and could not find out anything about any examinations that may have been held.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman has stated that this has no application to the employees who are appointed in accordance with civil-service regulations. Will the gentleman tell us how broad the field is for the exercise of complete discretion on the part of the Board outside of civil service?

Mr. WOODRUM. I should qualify my statement about the civil service, because I think, perhaps, this language would require even civil-service employees to be confirmed if the salary involved was more than $5,000; but the Board has absolute authority to appoint attorneys and experts outside of civil service. However, in fairness, I should say that the Board has stated to us that in each instance where they have appointed an expert they have submitted a description of his duties and his qualifications to the Civil Service Commission and received clearance from the Civil Service Commission in that way, although, of course, there is no open or competitive civil-service examination.

Mr. MAPES. The Board is required by the statute to appoint employees, except attorneys and experts, according to the civil service?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; and, so far as I know, they have scrupulously done that.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I may say to the gentleman that I agree with what he has stated, that as a matter of general policy we should not adopt the policy of requiring confirmation by the Senate of all those appointed to positions of $5,000 or more; but I am somewhat familiar with the conditions existing in the organization of the Social Security Board and I think we should agree to requiring confirmation by the Senate of those receiving $5,000 or more. There are many reasons I could give for this position, but I shall simply state at this time that I believe in the public interest this should be done.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. What would be the effect of the Senate passing on the qualifications of these appointees retroactively? Is not that a very unusual procedure?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, the whole thing, I will say to my friend, is very unusual, and that is the reason the House conferees have held out against the provision.

Mr. LUDLOW. Would it not be disruptive of the existing service?

Mr. WOODRUM. Undoubtedly; to some extent this will make some changes in personnel at the Social Security Board and, as a matter of fact, that is what the other end of the Capitol is interested in doing.

Mr. LUDLOW. If I may ask the gentleman one further question, how many of these appointments would be taken up retroactively?

Mr. WOODRUM. As I recall, there were over 200 experts appointed.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Since some Members of the House have been completely overlooked in this set-up, and inasmuch as the Senate will have the right to confirm these appointments, and because, for instance, we in Texas have a signed agreement with our Senators, does not the gentleman think if we could have the Senators confirm the appointments it might happen we would get a few jobs down there for our constituents?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is one way to look at it, but I say this to my friend from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE], that I think it will be a very unfortunate thing for the social-security set-up if it is ever plunged into partisan politics, and that is one of the added reasons why the House conferees have resisted this Senate amendment. But there is merit in the fact that here is a large, growing, expanding organization that is going to be bigger and better as the years go on, with such a large important part of its personnel over which no part of the executive or legislative branch of the Government has any control whatever.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The Social Security Board, in their appointments that are not subject to Civil Service, are in partisan politics now, and most of the appointments have been made from certain classes and certain people with certain political prejudices.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Would it be in order now to ask questions with respect to the bill as a whole?

Mr. WOODRUM. This amendment is the only thing before the House.

Mr. RICH. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to the independent offices appropriation bill what the total amount of the bill is now, in conference and coming from the Senate.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not have those figures, because the House has passed on that, and the only thing remaining are these three amendments. Those figures are all in the RECORD.

Mr. RICH. The figures as I have them, as it passed the House, are $1,140,313,398. The gentleman knows that last year the amount of this bill was $1,079,047,416, and that we are increasing it $61,265,882 over what it was a year ago.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is because we have increased activities.

Mr. RICH. But we have increased it over what it was 2 years ago by $335,079,240. If the gentleman is talking about economy——

Mr. WOODRUM. I was not talking about economy.

Mr. RICH. The President started to talk about economy with some of us, and I thought the gentleman was interested in economy.

Mr. WOODRUM. I talked economy here the other day, and they threw me out on my ear, and I have quit talking about it for a while.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think it is about time that this House became economy conscious?

Mr. WOODRUM. I would be very glad to see that, but I am awfully weak in my hopes.

Mr. RICH. The President has asked it, and does not the gentleman think it is about time we had it? The President is going to take all you Democrats down to Jefferson Island next Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, and I would say that the President, if he wanted to do a good thing for this country, while he has got you fellows down there, trying to drive you into a continuing rubber stamp, would then stamp you to the effect that you must economize, otherwise you will wreck this Government. The only trouble the President is weak when it comes to economy and sound business in government. He lacks much.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am sure that the President will be glad to have that observation from the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The President has not given me an invitation, but I want you to convey this message to him. You ask him, "Where are we going to get the money?" He has forgotten his statements on economy in government.

Mr. WOODRUM. If I do that, I know what the President's answer will be. He will say, "There is my friend RICH, from Pennsylvania, from rich Pennsylvania, and his business and industry is 100 to 150 percent better than it was sometime ago, and you just go back and put a little more taxes on him, because he can stand it." [Laughter.]

Mr. RICH. I voted for practically every tax measure that has come up here, but you have a lot of fellows over there who will not vote for a tax measure when it comes up, but will vote to spend any amount of money, and I will put my record up with that of any Member of Congress in that respect, and I think the gentleman will agree with me that I have been voting right, and I say now that we have to raise the money, let it fall wherever it may, and those who have it must pay, but the thing to do today is not to tax people beyond their ability to pay, but you must stop this reckless spending. That is what you want to instill into the Members of the Democratic Congress at the present time. You are wrecking business; you are wrecking our foundation of government.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am going to try to do that, but right on that point, the gentleman is a good sport, and I am just wondering if here, within the bosom of the family, he would not admit to us what I know to be a fact, and that is that the great industrial enterprise in which he is interested is from 100 to 175 percent better off than it was last year.

Mr. RICH. I will say this——

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, come on, come on.

Mr. RICH. That business has been improving; but if you will let the C. I. O. go on, and do not take any notice of the way they are trying to wreck industry in this country, you will not have any business interest in this country very soon to give employment to labor. The responsibility for the recklessness going on now rests with the President and the Democratic Party, and it is up to them to try to give the business interests of this country an opportunity to continue to give employment to labor, so that the men who want to work may have that privilege. That is the greatest responsibility you have today. The President asked that the steel interests sign up with Mr. Lewis; who is he? He makes contracts as he did with General Motors, and yet they strike. No end to strikes; his contract is no good. The unions should be compelled to incorporate, so that you have a responsible head so that when an industry signs a contract that it will be worth the paper it is written on. The union should be just as responsible for a contract as a manufacturer. Remember there is always two sides to an agreement.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. Our genial friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] uses a stereotyped expression, "rubber stamp", as applicable to Democratic Members of Congress. I wonder how many of us were here and had the opportunity of observing the attitude of the gentleman from Pennsylvania while the Interior Department appropriation bill was pending, when he made a very splendid speech in behalf of a certain appropriation included in that bill, in fact, stood in with the subcommittee with respect to that.

Then the distinguished minority leader came down and first smiled at the gentleman and then pulled his eyes down, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] did not vote the way he talked.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? You will find that the gentleman is absolutely wrong; that when it comes to voting money for worthy projects that will give this country the things it needs the gentleman from Pennsylvania has always been there.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. I decline to yield further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman from Kentucky does not have the time to yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. I listened to the eloquent tone of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I was convinced that that particular item was one item that was justified.

Mr. RICH. What was it? The gentleman cannot name it.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. But when the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] cracked the whip the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] "rubber-stamped." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RICH. That is the first time I ever knew it. The gentleman cannot give the name of the bill or the item.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. Yes; I can. It was the O'Connor amendment for $200,000 in the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. RICH. That was the best proposition in the whole bill. [Laughter.] But the House voted it down after the President cracked his whip.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. But we tried to follow the gentleman. We followed him in Committee of the Whole, but the gentleman voted in Committee of the Whole against his speech.

Mr. RICH. You voted it down.

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. Getting back to earth, if I understand correctly, there are three specific amendments involved here, but growing out of the final adoption of the conference report and the passage of this bill there are included all items connected with the independent offices appropriation bill, including grants-in-aid for old-age pensions, and everything like that, which ought to be passed by July 1.

Mr. WOODRUM. Which must be passed by July 1.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The only amendment to be considered now is the amendment cutting the salary of the executive secretary from $9,500 to $9,000?

Mr. WOODRUM. I have been discussing all of them. Of course, this comes first. The amendment immediately under consideration is an item that the Senate put in the bill cutting the salary of the executive secretary from $9,500 to $9,000. The reason given by those gentlemen is that they want to bring all of the salaries in line with the Classification Act.

Mr. O'MALLEY. But the gentleman seeks to dispose of that amendment first?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. I am going to move the previous question on that unless some other gentleman has some question to ask.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WARREN). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the previous question be ordered.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to recede and concur in Senate amendment no. 5.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-two Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 93]

Allen, Pa.	Engel	Johnson, Minn.	Romjue
Andrews	Fitzpatrick	Johnson, Okla.	Sabath
Bates	Flannagan	Keller	Sadowski
Bernard	Fleger	Kirwan	Sauthoff

Eaton	Jacobsen	Reilly
Ellenbogen	Jenkins, Ohio	Rogers, Okla.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hundred and twenty-nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1938, CONFERENCE REPORT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 21, amendment no. 7: "Provided further, That no salary shall be paid for personal services from the money herein appropriated under the heading 'Social Security Board' in excess of the rates allowed by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, for similar services: Provided further, That this proviso shall not apply to the salaries of the Board members."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 7.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 7.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to announce to the Members of the House that the bill known as the good-behavior bill, which we expected to call up this afternoon, will not be reached until Tuesday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is the other bill to come in?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; neither of the bills.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. When does the gentleman expect that bill to come up?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Next Tuesday.

Mr. MICHENER. And is that to be followed by the other bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The other bill will follow on Thursday, I understand.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I asked for recognition on this particular amendment because it deals with the Classification Act. It is unfortunate that the gentleman from Virginia moved to recede and concur in the Senate amendment which places all salaries of the Social Security Board under the Classification Act. Had he not moved to recede and concur, I had hoped that he would yield to me to offer an amendment which would place the Social Security Board employees in the District of Columbia under the Apportionment Act. The parliamentary situation is such that, of course, a motion to recede and concur takes precedence over a motion to recede and concur with an amendment. Unless the gentleman from Virginia would give me the opportunity to offer this amendment to the Senate amendment, it would not be possible for us to act upon this matter now. I know from previous action of the House that the House is in favor of applying the Apportionment Act to every group of Government employees. We should apply it to the employees of the Social Security Board in the District of Columbia. The amendment is similar to an amendment that was offered on other acts.

If the motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment is defeated, then it becomes possible to offer this amendment to the Senate amendment.

I ask the gentleman from Virginia if he will not make it possible for me to offer this amendment to the Senate amendment in disagreement?

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that, of course, I would be delighted to accommodate the gentleman, except that the parliamentary situation is such that it would not be germane at this point in the bill, for the question of civil service and apportionment is not involved.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The amendment in disagreement is an amendment affecting the classification of the salaries of the employees of the Social Security Board. Why would not an amendment that placed the employees of this board in the District of Columbia under the Apportionment Act be germane?

Mr. WOODRUM. For the reason that these employees already are under civil service and apportionment.

Mr. O'MALLEY. That is the very proposition we are trying to reach in amendment no. 8; they are not under civil service and this amendment would bring those employees of this board in the District of Columbia under the Apportionment Act.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mostly from Wisconsin and New York, I suppose.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I can assure the gentleman that I know of few from Wisconsin, much to my regret. If the House wants to apply apportionment to the employees of the Social Security Board they can do so by voting down this motion to recede and concur. This will make it possible for me to offer this motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman does not mean to imply, does he, that the same rule of apportionment does not apply to the Social Security Board as applies to other boards as far as employees who are under the civil service are concerned?

Mr. O'MALLEY. This applies to the employees in the District of Columbia and provides that apportionment shall be observed in hiring, furloughing, and in firing, just as it is observed in other departments.

Mr. MAPES. Does not the same rule apply now to the Social Security Board as applies to other boards as far as its employees under civil service are concerned?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Yes; but my amendment seeks to deal with those employees not under civil service.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to the reading of the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, the question of apportionment does not enter into this matter at all. The amendment on which we seek to recede and concur makes all salaries of the Social Security Board conform to the Classification Act.

The Social Security Board is now under the civil service and under apportionment insofar as all positions are concerned, with the exception of attorneys and experts.

Mr. O'MALLEY. My latest information is there are over a thousand attorneys and experts who are not under the Civil Service Act and 90 percent of them come from certain sections of the country.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think there are that many, but, of course, the attorneys and experts are not under the civil service and are not under the apportionment rule.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. Even though they are under the civil service, the apportionment rule has never been carried out.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is not the fault of the Commission.

Mr. FADDIS. If we would write this into the law, they might be a little more particular along that line.

Mr. WOODRUM. But it could not be written into law through a conference report.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is in error. The trouble with the apportionment law is not that it has not been carried out, but it was thrown out of balance during the World War and has not applied to dismissals, reinstatements, and things of that sort.

Mr. FADDIS. It has been 18 years since the World War and it has had time to adjust itself somewhat and not get worse.

Mr. RAMSPECK. It has not become worse.

Mr. FADDIS. The statistics show it has.

Mr. RAMSPECK. As a matter of fact, there are fewer employees from the District of Columbia now than there were 2 years ago under the apportionment system. I am as much in favor of the apportionment system as the gentleman. I know he does not want to make an erroneous statement.

Mr. FADDIS. I do not want to make an erroneous statement; but as long as these bureaucrats are allowed to go their way unmolested and are not checked by Members of Congress, just so long will they make a private patronage affair out of everything connected with the civil service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Congress by its own act has exempted from the civil service a great many agencies during the past few years. If the gentleman will investigate, he will find that there are more District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia people employed in the agencies outside civil service than there are in the civil-service agencies in Washington. I may cite the instance of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which I checked up, and I found out of 2,200 people 900 came from those areas indicated.

Mr. FADDIS. We are trying to rectify that here. I introduced an amendment to the relief appropriation bill which would have rectified the situation in that case. I intend to introduce the same amendment to every bill to which it may be germane.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I understand; but the gentleman made a statement which I think is in error.

Mr. O'MALLEY. That was my purpose in trying to get the opportunity to offer my amendment, which dealt with agencies like the Social Security Board, that did not entirely, or perhaps not at all, come under the Classification Act.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Social Security Board comes under the civil service, except for attorneys and experts, and Congress exempted those by specific language in the act.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I say that while the attorneys do not have a civil-service status, they must qualify for the work they are expected to do under the civil service.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] to recede and concur in Senate amendment no. 7.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FADDIS) there were—ayes 72, noes 24.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement with the amendment of the House thereto.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 8: Page 35, line 1, after amendment no. 7, insert ": Provided further, That none of the funds herein appropriated under the heading 'Social Security Board' shall be used to pay the salary of any expert or attorney receiving compensation of $5,000 or more per annum unless and until such expert or attorney shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

With the following House amendment:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That no part of the appropriation or of the reappropriation contained in this paragraph shall be used to pay the compensation of any employee of the Social Security Board not appointed pursuant to the civil-service laws and regulations."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], chairman of the subcommittee, a question: What does the amendment to the Senate amendment provide?

Mr. WOODRUM. The amendment to the amendment provides for putting all employees of the Social Security Board under civil-service requirements.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is, those receiving under $5,000?

Mr. WOODRUM. All of them.

Mr. COCHRAN. Including those receiving $5,000 and over?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. That was the House amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN. But the amendment of the Senate still remains as far as experts and attorneys are concerned?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is right.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I know it is not very pleasing to some Members of the House to listen to one of their colleagues speak in favor of the merit system. Now, just what does this Senate amendment do? The Senate amendment provides that in the future no expert or attorney who receives $5,000 or more can be appointed by the Social Security Board unless the Senate confirms the appointment. That is a direct slap at the merit system. Who can deny it?

The amendment proposed by the House conferees to the Senate amendment, according to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], chairman of the House conferees, places—I use his language—

Puts all employees of the Social Security Board under civil-service requirements.

That would be fine; but the paragraph as it will read if the motion of the gentleman from Virginia prevails does just this: It places all employees of the Security Board under civil service except those receiving $5,000 a year or more, so far as the attorneys and experts are concerned. Therefore you see it does not place all employees in the classified service, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] says, if I understand the language of the amendment. To me it appears that every attorney and every expert now working in the Social Security Board who receives $5,000 a year or more cannot be paid out of this appropriation until the President has sent their names to the Senate and the Senate has confirmed the nominations. It further means that everyone appointed in the future will be subject to confirmation by the Senate if he is an attorney or an expert and is to receive $5,000 or more. Then, again, as I understand the amendment, if an employee now has a civil-service rating and is an attorney or an expert and is now getting $4,000 or $4,500 a year and is promoted to a position paying $5,000 or more he cannot be paid that amount out of this appropriation until his name has been submitted to the Senate and he is confirmed. I further contend that if this attorney or expert who is now in the classified service who will benefit under the retirement law is stepped up to a position paying $5,000 or more and his name is submitted to the Senate and confirmed, when he accepts the new salary he then can no longer be considered to be in the classified service. If this be true, you are going to ruin the morale of the classified service insofar as the attorneys and experts are concerned. It is a step backward, and if the House rejects the amendment, sends it back to the Senate, and says we will not stand for this proposal, I predict the Senate will reverse itself.

What is going to become of the career service insofar as attorneys and experts are concerned? Who is going to define what an expert is? It seems to me every executive will be classed as an expert by the Senate. They will if the Senate has its way. A similar amendment has already been added to the relief bill, the bill appropriating money for the Works Progress Administration. Adopt this amendment and the one in the relief bill, and every appropriation bill in the future will most likely have a similar amendment.

I understand a certain Senator is very much displeased because he cannot have his way about some of the appointments in the Social Security Board and this amendment is the result. If there is one agency of the Government out of which politics should be kept it is the agency which is going to deal with the aged of this country. Put politics into the Social Security Board and it will ruin any administration. We heard a great deal about playing politics with misery. I warn the Congress not to make the Social Security Board a political organization. I do not think it will because public sentiment will not stand for it. This Senate amendment will enable some political appointments.

I think it is a mistake for the House to agree to the Senate amendment, and I hope the Members will vote it down. What is it going to mean to the Members of this House if the amendment carries? Just ask yourselves how many people you are going to appoint under the Social Security Board who will receive a salary of $5,000 or more. You know you will not dictate one appointment. The amendment says "with the advice and consent of the Senate." There is no mention of the House. The Social Security Board will be justified when you seek an appointment in saying "you voted to leave it to the Senate and that is what we must do under the law you enacted. Get the Senators to submit your friend's name and then we will be compelled to consider it." Is not that the situation that will confront you?

I have heard a great many of the Members of the House talk in the cloak room about what they are getting in the way of patronage not only from the Social Security Board but from a lot of other Government agencies. I have heard a lot of Members of the House criticize their Senators for the way they are being treated. When the time comes that my retention in Congress is going to depend entirely upon my securing a few jobs, the time will have arrived when I have outlived my usefulness and should be retired. The election of a Congressman or Senator is not predicated upon his ability solely from the standpoint of securing jobs. The great majority of our constituents expect more than that of us. I want all the patronage I can secure for my district and will fight for it. I believe in the apportionment of Government jobs—those under civil service and those that are not. The people of my district will have a better opportunity to secure positions with the Government if they are under civil service. The people of this country, the taxpayers, believe in civil service and they are in the great majority. They know what it would mean if the merit system was abolished. I feel that I speak the sentiments of my constituents when I say they are willing to compete with the other people of this country, if the positions be properly apportioned among the States of the Union. You know and I know that some States have received far more positions than they are entitled to. This not only applies to civil service but also to the emergency employees. It is the States close to Washington that have been favored and we should keep up the right to see that a fair apportionment of all positions is made among the various States. We are making progress in that direction now.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does not this amendment indicate that the Senators will get the good jobs at good salaries if there are to be any, and the Members of the House will have the rest of them?

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman does not seem to fully understand. My eyes are wide open. I can see what is going to happen. It means much more than that, because these people to be approved by the Senate are going to have the key positions in the department. Those who control the key positions in a department are going to control appointment in the departments, and do not let anybody tell you any different. They will eventually be the bureau chiefs and when the time comes to select other employees they will make the recommendations. The gentleman certainly should be able to realize that. I sincerely hope the House will vote this amendment down, as it is an assault upon the merit system and means that the career man goes out of the picture so far as the attorneys and experts are concerned, and I ask again who is going to decide what an expert is?

If you adopt the amendment in this bill surely you will do it when the relief bill comes back here, and you will do it when they add amendments to other appropriation bills. Do not let anyone tell you that you are not setting a precedent.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman and I were on the Committee on Civil Service together 12 years ago, and have served on that committee for many years. He and I have battled for the merit system. We did not want to be glorified job hunters, but we wanted to feel that if we do justice to our constitutents they have to merit it through the medium of civil-service examinations.

May I call the attention of the gentleman to page 82 of the hearings of the Committee on the Civil Service regarding the very subject we are discussing. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER] asked the personnel director, Mr. Aronson, the following question:

Mr. MOSER. What is the total number of employees, then?
Mr. ARONSON. The total number of employees is 5,104.
Mr. MOSER. How many veterans were considered?
Mr. ARONSON. I do not know how many veterans were considered.

Further on there appears the following:

Mr. MOSER. How many stenographers have you employed from the Civil Service Commission eligible list that was established as a result of the examination held last August, and that were certified in February of this year?
Mr. ARONSON. I do not know offhand. I should say somewhere between 100 and 150.
Mr. MOSER. How many stenographers do you employ?
Mr. ARONSON. I am afraid that I could not estimate the exact number.

Later on the following appears:

Mr. MOSER. You do not know how many stenographers you have employed now?

Mr. ARONSON. Frankly, I do not. I should say offhand that we had about 300 in the Washington office. I do not know how many we have in our Baltimore office or in the field offices; probably several hundred also.

My distinguished colleague the gentleman from Virginia will agree with me that he and I battled for the merit system, to give a fair and square deal to the men and women of the country. How does any Congressman know who is being appointed, where he is being appointed, and how he is being appointed? We are voting like sheep today. None of us know. I think the time is coming when the gentleman should demand an investigation of all the appointments of the Social Security agency to do justice to the merit system.

Mr. WOODRUM. I have yielded to my friend from New York, but I am interested to know, and I am sure the membership of the House would be interested to know, what the gentleman feels about the action on this amendment.

Mr. SIROVICH. I am going to vote with the gentleman upon the theory that as a fair- and square-minded man who is appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars to protect the aged and the unemployed he is going to be with us in doing justice to the civil-service people. I have done more than any man in Congress on the subject of old-age pensions for 12 years, speaking for hours here, but I do not have a job in the Social Security Board and cannot have people appointed, even though they have the finest standing upon the register.

Mr. WOODRUM. I appreciate the contribution of my friend the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. I am going to support the contention of the gentleman upon the theory that when the time comes he will support a resolution which I or someone else will introduce in the Committee on the Civil Service, because we are all civil-service-minded.

The gentleman does not want to be a glorified job hunter, and neither do I, but I do demand in the name of justice to the civil service that the people who have civil-service standings should be considered, and those who do not have it should be relegated to the background.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I am interested in what the gentleman from New York has stated, because he is a distinguished member of the Committee on the Civil Service. Of course, the question here is, What is to be done with the Senate amendment, which provides that the Senate shall have the confirmation of all positions with salaries of over $5,000. The House will remember that early in the procedure the conferees brought back to the House the recommendation that we put the whole works under civil service. This was my thought at that time, that the whole Social Security organization, from top to bottom, lawyers, experts, and everything, should be put under civil service. The House adopted an amendment of this kind. It went to the Senate, but we have not been able to get it acted on. The natural handicap arises of trying to have legislation of that sort considered and acted upon in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. In the copy of the bill which I have there is no reference to putting these experts and attorneys under the Civil Service. I do not understand the gentleman's motion. Where is the action of the House amending the Senate amendment to which he refers?

Mr. WOODRUM. The parliamentary situation is this: The Senate adopted the amendment which the gentleman will find is amendment no. 8.

The House agreed to that amendment with an amendment putting them all under civil service from top to bottom. The Senate disagreed to that, and that is where we stand now.

Mr. MAPES. That does not appear, however, in the printed copy of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. But that is the existing parliamentary situation.

Mr. DOWELL. And the gentleman now wants the Senate amendment adopted?

Mr. WOODRUM. As a last resort, yes. We have got to get this bill passed. I would like to see something done of a permanent nature on a legislative bill that would put the Social Security Board under the merit system, but we cannot do that now, because we are in the latter part of June and this bill must be passed.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. How many appointees are affected, approximately, by this amendment?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is my recollection there are between 250 and 300 experts and attorneys who would be affected by the provision.

Mr. DOWELL. That is the number of both experts and attorneys?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; where the salary is over $5,000.

Mr. DOWELL. And are these men to be in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WOODRUM. Anywhere in the Social Security Board; but, as a matter of fact, practically all of them are in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOWELL. And will their work be in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Assuming the Senate amendment is adopted and a man rising in the ranks of this Board reaches the point where he is about to be promoted to receive a salary of $5,000, it will then be incumbent upon him to see to it that he can be confirmed by the Senate, will it not?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the way it stands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he is confirmed by the Senate, will he lose his civil-service status?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not so understand it.

Mr. COCHRAN. My information is to the contrary. We should have definite information. We should be informed whether or not a man ceases to become a civil-service employee under such circumstances. It seems to me this is very important. We should protect the civil-service employee.

Mr. WOODRUM. This does not apply to civil-service employees, I may say to the gentleman. This only applies to attorneys and experts who are not under civil service.

Mr. COCHRAN. But the trouble is the amendment does not say "not under civil service." What the intent is amounts to nothing. It is what the amendment says.

Mr. WOODRUM. Now, if the gentleman will permit me a moment, amendment no. 8 of the Senate provides that attorneys and experts are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. These people are not civil-service employees. They may have a civil-service status, but they are not civil-service employees with the Social Security Board.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that a man who was working in the Veterans' Administration and receiving a salary of $6,000 a year, who had knowledge of old-age pensions and qualified as an expert, went over to the Social Security Board at $6,000, who was a civil-service employee, being under the Classification Act and eligible to retirement, when he is transferred to the Social Security Board he ceased to be a civil-service employee and ceased to be entitled to benefits under the Retirement Act?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not understand that he does.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will not the appointment of such a man have to be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not understand it would apply to such an appointment.

Mr. COCHRAN. How do you get around that? I do not understand the gentleman's logic. The amendment certainly applies to those already employed as well as those who will be employed in the future.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman states this amendment comes over here from the Senate, and we have got to do something to pass this bill. This amendment lets the other body select the appointee and dictate appointments to every job above $5,000 a year. Why does this body always have to give in, even though it is almost July 1? Why can we not send this back to the Senate? Why should we be the good Boy Scouts this week? Next week will be Boy Scout week.

Mr. WOODRUM. I was arguing that with the gentleman a couple of weeks ago, and the gentleman did not agree with me then.

Mr. O'MALLEY. This is different.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the Members of the House for a few minutes, I want to call attention to the fact that the particular question we have up here today with respect to this bill is not an isolated problem.

As the gentleman from Virginia has already said, the Senate has put in the relief bill a similar provision. In addition to this, I am informed by a very prominent Member of the body at the other end of the Capitol that the bill which this House passed, putting postmasters under civil service, will not be permitted to be considered by that body, unless and until the House passes another bill giving the Senate the right to confirm postmasters.

Personally, I may say it is up to the House. I have no particular personal interest in the matter, but I think we may well consider whether or not we are going to turn over to the body at the other end of this Capitol the right to run all the jobs in the Government service and have the key positions in the Government service throughout this land controlled by Members of that body. In this way they will control the promotions and the appointments all the way down the line.

That is exactly what we are facing. If this constitutes a precedent, that is what we may as well look for.

Mr. O'MALLEY. They will not only control the promotions all the way down the line, but they will control the hiring and the firing.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Absolutely, they will control the whole thing. In answer to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I say to the gentleman that in my judgment any civil-service employee under this proposal who is promoted to a $5,000 a year job as an attorney or an expert, will lose his civil-service status.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He would?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, it breaks up the whole career system?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes. But he might hold a civil-service position paying over $5,000 a year. As I understand this, it applies only to positions not in the civil service. Is not that correct?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. RAMSPECK. And it may be considered as a precedent?

Mr. WOODRUM. Under ordinary circumstances I would not be in favor of this, but I have the definite promise and positive assurance of gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol that it will not be considered as a precedent, but that it is well, because of the large number of experts appointed by the Social Security Board and the manner in which they were appointed and the fact that now no one has control over it, that there should be some opportunity for the legislative branch to have some control over it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I think the House is just as important as the other branch of Congress, and I know if we do not stand up for our rights, we will not have any rights but we will turn them over to the other body.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman an additional minute. The gentleman is such an important member of the Civil Service Committee, being the chairman of it, that I would be most interested to know what the gentleman thinks the course of the House should be in this particular case.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think we ought to insist on the House position but I realize the difficulty in which the gentleman from Virginia and his committee find themselves, with no funds to carry on this great activity. Not only the social security activity is involved, but as I understand it, the Veterans' Administration and various other agencies are tied up in this bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman of course knows how difficult it is for conferees of the Committee on Appropriations to try to write civil service provisions in a conference report on an appropriation bill. Does the gentleman think, if the House should adopt this amendment today, that there would be any reason in the world why the Civil Service Committee, or an appropriate committee, should not report appropriate legislation, which would reach this situation in a proper manner?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I agree with the gentleman. I have no brief for the Social Security Board. I think there is some mismanagement there that should be corrected.

Mr. SIROVICH. Why would it not be possible to eliminate all politics and put attorneys and tax experts and all of them under civil service, where they belong?

Mr. WOODRUM. That ought to be done, but it ought to come from the gentleman's committee and not from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman would support such legislation?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, I would support it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the House receding and concurring in the Senate amendment, but I want to say, as a Member of the House and as a member of the legislative branch of this Government, I do not see where there is anything disgraceful about a legislator having any say in the appointment of minor officials of this Government. Whether we are Members of this or the other body, we are the direct representatives of the people and as such are responsible to them. Politics and politicians are what made the United States of America, and made it the greatest nation in the world. We are a political people, and when we cease to be so we will cease to be a nation. Let us take an example of political appointments with which no one has anything to do except the members of the legislative branch. Take the appointments to Annapolis and West Point. Where in the United Stats will you find a better or more trustworthy body of men than the graduates of the Military and Naval Academies? They are appointed there with certain limiting qualifications, of course, by Members of Congress.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. No; I have not the time. Another thing, when the other body read the testimony given by the personnel director of the Social Security himself, as recorded in the pages of the hearings, as read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], wherein the personnel director of the Department himself admits that he has no knowledge of how many of these various positions he has; that he has no knowledge of the various apportionment among the veterans, and no knowledge of any of the appointments concerned with his own bureau, it is no wonder that another body is determined that they must have a check on the appointments under this situation. I think that all things connected with this social-security matter merit an investigation by the House of Representatives, particularly when Members of Congress give one of their constituents a letter to go down there and look for a job and that constituent is told that the letter had been thrown into the wastebasket, right in front of the very eyes of the applicant.

Mr. DUNCAN. And is it not a fact that under the present set-up it is neither patronage nor civil service? They have developed a bureaucratic form of political patronage themselves.

Mr. FADDIS. Absolutely; a personal patronage system for the benefit of a few people within it. It is neither fish nor fowl. It certainly merits a thorough investigation.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I agree with what the gentleman says. Does not the gentleman think that regardless of what action may be taken here today, it would be eminently proper for the Civil Service Committee of the House, which is supposed to have jurisdiction over this Bureau, with the exception of experts, to go into the matter and have a thorough investigation or consideration of just exactly what rules are applying down there, and report such legislation as in their judgment would remedy that situation?

Mr. FADDIS. Most assuredly no.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is not the function of the Committee on Appropriations. We cannot do it.

Mr. FADDIS. That is quite true. I believe the Civil Service Committee should thoroughly investigate it. Those who upheld the so-called merit system may, if they please, refer to those who oppose it as glorified job hunters. Nevertheless we are the ones responsible for the expenditure of the money we appropriate for the expenses of government. We must obtain this money from the people of the Nation in the form of taxes. When we surrender our control over the appointment of those who administer and expend we are lax in our duties as the direct representatives of the people.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the fact that this amendment does away with the merit system and then it puts all the power in the other body. We say we ought to protect the rights of the politician. The gentleman who just preceded me said that.

I think he is right. He says we should have an investigation of the Social Security. He says that if a Congressman sends a letter down there they throw it into the wastebasket. Why do they throw it into the wastebasket? Because we have given all of our powers to the Senate.

There is not anything in the Constitution of the United States, there is not anything in the statutes which says that the Senate should confirm these employees. When we abandon that power to them we really give away all of our power, and then there is not any chance for us to have anything to do with the Social Security itself. My friends, that is common sense. I am not talking civil service right now. I am talking politics. That is what I am doing. [Applause.]

In the relief organization, we get up here and cuss Harry Hopkins. Why? Because he does not have to, and cannot, pay any attention to us. Why, again? Because we turn over his big jobs to the Senate. When they have that power their appointees give jobs to all of their friends and build up their political machines. Well, then, let us take that power away from the Senate; we can do it if we want to. Let us vote this amendment down. Somebody said we must have the money by July 1. Let us defeat this now, and before July 1 perhaps the Civil Service Committee will come out with a report.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman permit me to send to him all of my inquiries from the State of Texas as to when they are going to get old-age benefits, and let him explain why they do not get them, because we did not vote the money?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes; I will be glad to do that. I will give the gentleman a further answer, and that is that if we insist on this thing it will be settled by July 1. I have heard the gentleman from Virginia get up here and say the other body is going to recede. I have heard the gentleman say that two or three times. If the House of Representatives is to have any power, it must not abandon all its rights to the Senate.

It is said we must do this because it is an emergency and the Senate "refuses to recede." If the other body is unreasonable, let us stick by our guns and they will have the responsibility of holding up old-age benefits, not this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER].

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I come before you as one who has served 22 years in the classified civil service of the United States, followed by 10 years in civilian life before becoming a Member of the House, and I yield to no man in my loyalty to a true merit system. But I did not come here expecting to find personal politics exploited by bureaucracy under the guise of civil service that has nothing to do with partisanship, as it is applied by bureaucracy in some of these Government bureaus.

I should like to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that in the words of Thomas Jefferson, used in the Declaration of Independence, "accordingly all experience hath shewn" any man that gets in a position in the classified service and advances to a position where he is confirmed by the Senate loses his civil-service status. There is no rule governing it, but he does lose it, nevertheless. I have seen those who resigned from Senate-confirmed positions, on the change of an administration, to reacquire their classified status. What more conclusive proof could be asked?

When opportunity was presented to me as a member of the Civil Service Committee to question Mr. Aronson, Personnel Director of the Social Security Board, I rose to the occasion with the greatest of pleasure, because in all of my visits to the Social Security Board he never had time to see me on any one occasion. Prior to my coming to this body Mr. Winant had written me a letter, and he asked me if there was anything he could do to cooperate. I believed he had learned of my stalwart advocacy and defense of the Social Security Act. That was before he resigned to take the platform in the last campaign. I submitted to him the name of a man who had built up a policemen's and firemen's insurance and old-age benefit fund, because these men could not get the insurance in commercial companies that they needed on account of their hazardous occupations. Mr. Winant acknowledged it. It was bandied about in the Social Security Board, and he never qualified as an expert. He had made this policemen's and firemen's insurance and benefit fund an institution that is self-sustaining. I asked Mr. Aronson what constituted expertness. He pointed out what he conceived to constitute expertness. It was the dispensing of social benefits, spending and handing out tax money, with no other occupation. I then recounted to him the qualifications of this man. He replied that this particular individual would be obliged to have devoted his entire energy, instead of doing it gratuitously. The building up of the policemen's and firemen's old-age and social-security fund, with the only exception of assistance to the blind, could not qualify because undivided attention had not been given to it.

The Civil Service Committee hearings on H. R. 5558, 5821, and 6497, pages 85, 86, and 87, will show this interrogation, where two named individuals, whose sole experience heretofore known has consisted of administering relief under the dole system in vogue before the adoption of the Government agencies, and since then under State administration of United States reemployment services as applied. One of these has been qualified as an expert, and the other has acquired a civil-service status and Social Security appointment, with the qualifying examination prescribed to fit the favored applicant's peculiar experiences. Though these men operated in my district for some years past, their activities and qualifying experience has been to draw salaries for handing out, under the dole systems, what must be gathered by taxation, as contrasted to the experience of the man who served gratuitously, builded a social-security system for firemen and policemen, and made it self-sustaining without appropriations or taxation, but solely from dues paid in by the beneficiaries. I urge my colleagues to read this testimony.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of the Members that Mr. Aronson evaded one question after the other. He said that he had appointed between 100 and 150 stenographers. My notes taken at the time show that he said 105, and he declares that he did not know how many stenographers he had. On page 83 of the hearings will be found his admission that he was given 30, 60, then 90 days to appoint from the civil-service roster of February 15, 1937, admitting his time expired May 15, 1937, yet he has not complied.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania so he can tell us what he thinks about this amendment.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. I am in favor of the amendment as it is; but I do want to say just briefly for the benefit of my colleague and friend the gentleman from Virginia that while I support the amendment as but a short step in the right direction, I want to embrace this opportunity to call to the attention of the House the necessity of representing the constituency of our respective districts who come to us time after time and to whom we make the statements that must be made in behalf of civil service, that it behooves us to stand up as men and assert ourselves in getting through the type of legislation that it has been suggested should originate in the Civil Service Committee and arrest the progress of the frauds we know are being perpetrated in the name of civil service, to the utter disregard of merit, and highly prejudicial to remotest semblance of a merit system.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON].

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I am astonished that a man who spent 22 years in civil service could be elected to Congress because while in the civil service he never could be for anyone openly, and how he could come to Congress after 22 years of that kind of inaction, is a mystery to me.

I just want to say that under this administration—this is a little politics, then I will proceed—civil service has never been so jittery as now notwithstanding the fact that early in the administration postmasters were being placed under civil service. What has happened since then, have those who are employed in the civil service shaking in their boots, they do not know where they stand.

I am in favor of this amendment, because one of the wickedest wastes that has occurred in the Government service in the last few years, not to say just in this administration, is the appointment of vast numbers of law-school graduates as assistant attorneys general and solicitors in the departments here. They have been appointed by the hundreds, just out of law school. I have checked up on this during 4 years of hearings in the Appropriations Committee and the subcommittees. The worst waste we have is the appointment of young lawyers without any real need of their services.

Mr. SIROVICH. In what departments are they being appointed?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. In about all of them. The fact that the Senate can check these people up will bring them to our attention and will halt this multiplicity of men being brought here; and I will say that nine-tenths of these $5,000 salaried men are lawyers, not many are experts. They are young lawyers or broken-down old lawyers who cannot earn a living at home. They are brought here and put into the departments. If the Senate can check them up it will be a wholesome thing.

I want to pay my respects to the Senate too. The Senate is three-quarters Democratic. The House is three-quarters Democratic. You know, and I know, that it has been generally admitted that this House would have voted any time this winter for the Court proposal. We know also that the Senate would not.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] was making an argument which I concluded to be one in favor of giving legislators, particularly Members of Congress, greater voice in the appointment of public officials. He has made similar statements on the floor before. I know he is sincere in his views, that he believes that the public service can best be served by giving Members of Congress more patronage in the appointment of Government officials. It was rather an ingenious argument.

I believe, however, that he predicated his argument for giving Members of Congress greater patronage on the high type of young men who now serve in the Military and Naval Academies. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania in all fairness whether he believes we would have the high type of young men we now have in these academies if Members of Congress alone were responsible for the appointments of those boys, and if the boys were not required to pass most severe mental and physical examinations? I submit that credit for the high type of student body in these academies does not rest on the shoulders of Members of Congress, because if they had the right to appoint the boys who are to receive this splendid education at Government expense and splendid opportunity for advancement, it would be just as bad as the spoils system has been under the Republican, the Democratic, and every other political party in this country.

I believe that the welfare of this country demands not a weaker but a stronger civil-service system, one that recognizes merit, one that gives an opportunity for a career service; and I commend the House for the action taken in this regard when this bill was before us a short time ago wherein we placed all of the employees of the Social Security Board under the Civil Service. I regret that the Senate has amended that action of the House.

I hope that we will vote down this motion to recede and concur in the interest of having a civil service.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, my views with reference to this matter of senatorial confirmation are well known. Under ordinary circumstances I would not support the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, but under the circumstances of today I feel as though I can do nothing short of supporting this suggestion.

There is no question in my mind but what there is a condition in the Social Security Board that ought to be opened up and looked into. Also, there is no question in my mind, or in the mind of any other Member of this House, that the 1st of July is approaching. It is almost upon us. Three or four more days of argument between the House and the Senate will probably leave great departments of the Government without any funds whatsoever on which to operate.

I therefore take this time to explain my attitude so that my vote may not be misunderstood, because, as I previously stated, my position with reference to this matter is well known. I express the hope that the motion offered by the gentleman from Virginia will be agreed to so that the business of the Congress may be expedited.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have had this expression from the membership of the House today. It demonstrates that the membership feels there should be some inquiry into the situation existing at the Social Security Board. The gentlemen on the Civil Service Committee, who have spoken, have voiced my sentiments exactly. I think we may reasonably expect they will take cognizance of the situation. I may say, as the gentleman from Texas stated, except for the unusual and extraordinary circumstances of the case I would not have offered the motion that I did today. However, it is impossible, for reasons that every Member will understand, for the conferees of the Appropriations Committee to make an investigation and work out appropriate rules and regulations for such an organization as the Social Security Board.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In connection with the work of the conferees, did the Senate absolutely refuse to recede?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Senate absolutely refused to recede and they base their action upon this ground, and I am not divulging secrets: The House conferees told the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol this action, if taken, would be a precedent, but those gentlemen stated it would not be a precedent. They felt the condition of the Social Security Board is such that the legislative branch of the Government in some way or other ought to have some say-so and they did not know of any other way it could be done. I hope the investigation or inquiry, which the gentlemen have spoken of today and have experienced an interest in will come up and be had if this confirmation is imposed upon employees of the Social Security Board.

May I say further, not only is this an appropriation bill covering the Social Security Board but other independent establishments of the Government, matters you and your constitutents are interested in, and it is absolutely necessary to get this wound up. Then there will be no reason in the world why the Civil Service Committee or any other committee the Congress wishes to constitute cannot go ahead with such action it may deem proper to take to put into effect the rules and regulations of a permanent character.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] that the House recede from its amendment to Senate amendment numbered 8 and concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAVERICK) there were—ayes 82, noes 43.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair observes that many Members did not rise when the previous vote was taken; therefore the Chair will count for a quorum. [After counting.] Two hundred and nineteen Members are present, a quorum.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a motion to reconsider all of the votes taken on this bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on the two matters taken up today and to include therein short references from reports on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

(Mr. FADDIS, Mr. DITTER, and Mr. MCLEAN asked and were given permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein copy of a brief address I made at a centennial exhibition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

RENEWAL OF STAR-ROUTE CONTRACTS

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5 and 9.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, and 8, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment, insert the following: "General: Provided, That no contract which has theretofore been sublet, no contract which is held by any contractor who is not eligible to bid under section 5 of this amendatory Act, and no contract which is performed principally by employees of the contractor shall be renewed by virtue of this section: And provided further, That prior to the renewal of any regular contract for a four-year period the Post Office Department shall, among other things, take into consideration (1) whether the service rendered by the contractor has been satisfactory to the patrons of the star route and to said Department, (2) whether the roads traversed in serving the star route have been materially improved in the meantime, and (3) the kind and character of the equipment provided by the contractor"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment, insert the following:

"The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, and in the interest of the Postal Service and under such regulations as he may prescribe, allow extra pay to a contractor for necessary increased travel caused by obstruction of roads, destruction of bridges, or discontinuance of ferries occurring during the contract term, but no extra pay allowed shall be proportionately greater than the rate established by the contract involved."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment no. 1: This amendment makes the language of section 1 of the House bill more specific in order to permit the Postmaster General to exercise his discretion as to renewal of star-route contracts in any case instead of in all cases, as provided in the House bill. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 2: This amendment clarifies the provisions of section 1 of the House bill relating to the basis for the exercise of the Postmaster General's discretion as to renewals of star-route contracts. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 3: This amendment strikes out the provision in section 1 of the House bill permitting an indefinite number of four-year renewals of star-route contracts after the first renewal thereof. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 4: This amendment prohibits the extension or renewal of any contract if theretofore sublet, if performed principally by employees of the contractor, or if the contractor does not meet the residential requirements; and requires the Post Office Department, in connection with renewals, to take into consideration the service rendered and the equipment provided by the contractor, road improvements, and the financial saving, if any, resulting to the Department; and authorizes renewal of contracts which are now being superseded by new contracts. The conference agreement retains the provisions of the Senate amendment except that it eliminates the provision limiting the extension of contracts (as distinguished from renewals), the provision requiring the Department to take into consideration the financial saving resulting to it in making renewals, and the provision authorizing renewal of contracts which are now being superseded by new contracts.

On amendment no. 5: This is a corrective amendment no longer necessary in view of the conference agreement on Senate amendment no. 6. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 6: This amendment strikes out the provisions of the House bill which authorized an upward adjustment in contracts where substantially altered by the assumption of additional mail volume or by substantial change in the condition of the highways, bridges, and ferries included in the route and upward or downward revisions where changes in schedule involve an increase or decrease in units of equipment. The conference agreement retains the provision for upward adjustments in contracts where the travel is increased by the obstruction of roads, destruction of bridges, or discontinuance of ferries.

On amendments nos. 7 and 8: These amendments make the provisions of section 5 of the bill limiting the consideration of proposals for carrying mail on star routes apply to proposals for renewals by contractors on star routes as well as original bidders for star-route contracts; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 9: This amendment requires the bidder or contractor in case of a star route to be a resident of the county from or to which the mail moves by water on such route; and the Senate recedes.

T. G. BURCH,
HARRY L. HAINES,
FRED H. HILDEBRANDT,
FRANK CARLSON,
E. HAROLD CLUETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 16.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 16

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4408) to provide for the renewal of star-route contracts at 4-year intervals, and for other purposes, the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed to strike out in section 2 "stated in" and insert in lieu thereof "required under", and to strike out in section 4 the word "contract" where it appears immediately preceding the word "legally" and insert in lieu thereof the word "contractor."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us why it is necessary to make these changes?

Mr. BURCH. The resolution, I may say to the gentleman from New York, changes the wording of the bill from "stated in" as it was when the bill was passed, to "required under", which should be the wording. It should read "required under the contract" instead of "stated in the contract." It is just a change of the wording. The other change is, the print of the bill reads "contract" where it should read "contractor."

Mr. SNELL. It does not in any way change the material effect of the bill?

Mr. BURCH. In no way at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELBERT ARNOLD JARRELL

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 703) for the relief of Elbert Arnold Jarrell, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$8,211" and insert "$5,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain this particular bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Yes. This particular bill, as it passed the House, carried the amount of $8,211 and involves an injury to a person growing out of an accident with a C. C. C. truck. The Senate reduced the amount to $5,000, so the question is on agreeing to the reduction from $8,211 to $5,000.

Mr. CARLSON. This includes the usual amendment we are now using, regarding taking the money out of the funds of the Civilian Conservation Corps instead of out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Yes; that is already in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOSEPH M. CLAGETT, JR.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 730) for the relief of Joseph M. Clagett, Jr., with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$1,000, and the additional sum of $40 per month during the remainder of his natural life."

Page 1, line 12, after "Provided", insert "That the guardian of Joseph M. Clagett, Jr., shall file an annual report with the Secretary of the Treasury as to the physical condition of Joseph M. Clagett, Jr.: Provided further."

Page 2, line 4, strike out all after "claim" down to and including "notwithstanding", in line 9.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GOLDIE DURHAM

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 937) for the relief of Goldie Durham, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OTIS CORDLE

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 988) for the relief of Otis Cordle, a minor, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. LOUIS ABNER

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 1065) for the relief of Mrs. Louis Abner, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "not otherwise appropriated" and insert "allocated by the President for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AN INVASION OF WASHINGTON IMMINENT

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, it is no betrayal of tactical secrets for me to say to you what you have already surmised, that this Capital is soon to be a beleaguered city. Every Member of this body who has been down along the water front has no doubt guessed that Washington is about to be invaded. The tents of the invaders may be seen at this moment, lining both banks of the Potomac, covering the grassy lawns of the parks around about the Reflecting Pool, at Hains Point, and along the Memorial Highway on the opposite side of the river. We are told that 30,000 of these invaders are anticipated. They will come from every State of the Union and from most foreign countries as well. Recently I saw two of the advance guard who had just arrived on foot from South America. They had walked all the way and had worn out several pairs of shoes in the feat, or should I say "and the feet"? This invading host will call their conquest of our Capital a "jamboree." No doubt it will be as complete a conquest under that euphonious term as ever caused the capitulation of a city by a siege.

In view of this approaching invasion, how about the defenses of Washington? The military strategists should be able to tell us about that, but I fear in this case it is an invasion against which the high command has no clear-cut plans. I doubt whether the military could protect the Capital in a case of this sort. My guess is that when this army of 30,000 descends upon us we might as well capitulate, for what have we to offer to resist their onslaught? Numbers is not the chief element of their strength. These thirty thousand come with overwhelming energy and the exuberance of youth. Each one of them is filled with enthusiasm, zeal, idealism, patriotism. How long will staid, conservative, sedate, official Washington last before such an attack? It would not surprise me but that gray and bearded solons from this very assembly will soon be out there in their camp. Bald and rotund Senators will be among the earliest prisoners, and I should not be at all surprised that one of their very first captives will be our Commander in Chief.

I am not so worried about the outcome and results of this invasion as the foregoing remarks imply. I do not expect to see very much physical damage done to our Capital, but no doubt extensive psychic reverberations will be set up. I can almost imagine that our capitulation to the army of Boy Scouts will be a good thing for Washington. These besiegers are armed with ideas and ideals. It would not be a bad outcome if they impress some of these upon us. Strange or logical, a Boy Scout's sense of obligation to his pledge is as deep and sincere as that which a Member of this House entertains for his oath and his official duty.

While we Congressmen like to make ourselves believe that each of us, as a Member of the national lawmaking body, is actuated by unselfish, humanitarian, patriotic motives and love of country, the real truth probably is that most of us could get valuable lessons in idealism and zeal from the Boy Scouts who are soon to be camped among us. To get a measure of this possibility, I suggest that each of us reread and rethink the Scout obligation, which each of these 30,000 holds sacred. While we, in prosaic legislative matters, are fighting the battles of humanity, and sometimes doing a poor job of it, let us recall that each of these Scouts is a young crusader fighting just as valiantly for the right—certainly in his dreams and aspirations—as we have ever hoped to do.

THE ARIZONA CONTINGENT

About a hundred of these invaders of Washington are coming all the way across the continent from Arizona. I know their Scout leaders personally, and some of their rank and file. Although they are besiegers and I am the besieged, I have already surrendered my offices, and I propose to fraternize that part of the invading host coming from the Cactus State. I can speak favorably of these Arizona Scouts, more favorably than of the others, because I have known them in their native haunts. True, they dress up like Indians, give the names of ferocious chiefs to their camps, and the like, but aside from that, they are a splendid lot.

I was on the Roosevelt Council of the Boy Scouts of America, having jurisdiction over Arizona, a number of years ago, and at that time the Scouts of Arizona established a summer camp up in our mountains. This they called Camp Geronimo, after our Apache publicity agent a half century ago. I recall then that a distinguished citizen of Phoenix, Dwight B. Heard, the owner of the State's greatest newspaper, was chairman of our State council. He was a well-to-do man and lost no opportunity of sharing literally of his means and time for the benefit of scouting. For instance, one summer when the boys had to be quarantined at Camp Geronimo, Mr. Heard sent Jersey cows and truckloads of oranges, in addition to medical care, that the boys might lack nothing.

Well do I remember at one meeting of that council when Mr. Heard said to us:

> We must have a State executive, since our present executive is leaving us, and I am as anxious that we pick the right man for this scouting program as I am to find the right manager for my publishing business.

Then he continued:

> Gentlemen, we need a man of varied capabilities, but above all, a leader of the right kind of ideals. I have just heard of such a man in Butte, Mont. He has recently been awarded a medal by the President of the United States for his fidelity to duty and his saving of human life. I have wired this man, asking whether he is available to fill our vacancy.

Fortunately for the Scouts of Arizona, this desirable leader, Ben Owen, was available; he came to Arizona and for several years he carried on a most remarkable program for the Boy Scouts of America in our community. Part of this scouting work was the training of Scout masters and Scout leaders, as the preparation for such is even more important than the organization of troops. Other Scout executives in Arizona have followed like Mr. Miller, continuing the work so well begun by Ben Owen, until today in that far southwestern community, which I represent in this body, and which a hundred Scouts and a dozen Scout masters will represent in the jamboree, the Boy Scout work has been placed upon an enviably high plane.

Now, it would not surprise me much to learn that the lady members of our force are in connivance with this oncoming host. And I have warned you, gentlemen of Congress, of what is immediately ahead for you. I predict that you are going to have to surrender. I have indicated the quality and strength of the Arizona contingent, and I am assuming that the whole 30,000 will be similar. Resistance is hopeless. I suggest that you just as well throw down your defenses, welcome the invaders, and profit more from them than they can profit from us. Such would be wisdom and good strategy—to say nothing of hospitality.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, for the hour that has been allotted to me to address the House, I intend to analyze the destructive and creative forces of modern world history and shall endeavor to show the relationship between communism, nazism, fascism, and New Deal democracy.

Mr. Speaker, only modern man has problems. The medieval man had no problems at all. Everything—his religion, his science, his economy, his art—was given to him by the church, the supreme authority of life. This happy idyll came to an end as a result of the breakdown of medieval universalism, with its ideal of one church, one language, and one state, and was replaced by individualism, through the Reformation in the north and the Renaissance in the south. Then the real drama of modern man began. Man's age-old conviction that the earth is the center of the world was destroyed. Copernicus showed him that the earth and not the sun is moving. Columbus showed him that the earth has no edge or end. With the destruction of man's century-old cosmological and planetary views, man's old beliefs and convictions concerning himself, nature, destiny, and his position in life slowly underwent radical changes and burdened him with new problems. His new cognitions and convictions fired him to new ambitions. When his old cosmological views were shattered, his religious beliefs and intellectual superstitions were also shaken to their very foundations. In discovering new worlds, he discovered himself, religiously in the Reformation, and intellectually and artistically in the Renaissance. The Reformation led to a new alignment of social and political forces, to the creation of the united German nation as a result of the translation of the Bible, and to the founding of the British Empire as a result of England's emancipation from Rome and its tremendous sea victories over the Spanish Armada. In the south, however, the discovery of man resulted in the creation of a new art, new philosophy, and new science and notably to a new mathematics which is the beginning of the technological age. Our entire industrial civilization would not be possible without the new mathematics. In the north the rediscovery of man through the Reformation led to a great religious crisis, which was terminated only upon the end of the Thirty Years' War in 1648, in the course of which Germany was nearly destroyed. It was only after that bloody war that the schism within Christianity developed into a new and permanent order, Catholicism on one side and Protestantism on the other. But no sooner was the religious issue settled than the political struggle against the growing despotism of the monarchy began on the European Continent. As a matter of fact, the French Revolution, with its doctrine of the right of the people to resist the despot, had its beginning in the last decade of the seventeenth century. It took almost 100 years for this theory to become the common possession of the masses, and it took all the stupidity of political absolutism to arouse the masses to resistance and rebellion. It can be said without fear of contradiction that to a certain extent the French Revolution, with its program of the political emancipation of man, was only the aftermath of the Reformation, with its doctrine of the religious emancipation of man. In the world in which man is religiously emancipated he also wants to be politically free. Thus the political crisis in the western world epitomized by the French Revolution, was only a logical aftermath of the Reformation, which had spent itself by the middle of the seventeenth century. From that time on western man became politically busy. It took him a hundred years to prepare himself for the political struggle. In 1789 the French Revolution broke out, and by the middle of the nineteenth century the energies which generated from it were exhausted. By 1850 the French Revolution was only a matter of the past. But no sooner had the political struggle come to an end than the economic struggle began.

In 1848, the year of storm and stress, which witnessed the last tremor of the French Revolution, Karl Marx published his Communist Manifesto, which, however, at the time of its publication made but little impression. A few years later Karl Marx published his Critique of Political Economy, which he described in a letter to La Salle, as a prelude to his work Das Kapital. It was not before the eighties of the nineteenth century that the doctrine of Karl Marx became the driving force in political life on the European Continent.

From afar it may seem that Karl Marx in demanding economic equality for all men, is, as a historical phenomenon, a logical consequence of Luther and Danton. Martin Luther demanded religious equality, Danton, political equality, and Karl Marx, economic equality. This, however, is only an optical illusion, for Martin Luther demanded not only religious equality but religious freedom as well. Danton, as the central figure of the French Revolution, demanded not only political equality but also political freedom—freedom from a static order; but Karl Marx abhors freedom. He emphasizes equality, to the exclusion of freedom, because to him the driving force in history is economics. Karl Marx's man is not a thinking, singing, painting, or, in general, a creative man but is primarily an economic hungry man, always in quest of food. Marx's economic interpretation of history, which is the foundation upon which socialism and communism have developed, and upon which Marx's great reputation has been founded, is based upon the philosophical contemplation that the workingman has always been exploited economically, and that the final goal of history is economically satisfied masses, because man's preoccupation in life is food.

As against this economic materialistic conception of history of Karl Marx, with the masses alone being visible on the stage, there is the individualistic conception of history of Thomas Carlyle and Friedrich Nietzsche. Just as to Karl Marx the economically satisfied masses are the objective of the historical process, so to Thomas Carlyle, the great creative personality, the great man is the goal of history. Marx says that the masses make history; Thomas Carlyle contends that the personality makes history. How political history is made Carlyle showed in his biography of Frederick the Great. How international history is made he portrayed in his individualistic history of the French Revolution. It was made by personalities, not by the masses. How cultural history is made is shown in his life of Goethe. But while Thomas Carlyle, the disciplined and refined Scottishman, was satisfied with the thesis that the personality makes history, Friedrich Nietzsche, the ruthless and eccentric German, insisted that the personality is history, and that the masses are only a means of an end—to bring forth the great personality. Consequently, Nietzsche maintained that the great personality has a right to use the masses as he pleases, for the masses are only the fertilizers of history. Just as Karl Marx is inspired by the masses, so is Friedrich Nietzsche inspired by the overpowering personality. His regard for the great personality is not limited to the conqueror, to the great ruler, or to the great artist but also to the great revolutionist, to the great moralist. Hence Nietzsche's admiration for the Bible as a book of great heroes and overtowering personalities.

It is interesting to observe that these two contradicting philosophies of history, the individualistic of Carlyle and Nietzsche and the collectivistic of Karl Marx, drew their inspirations from two self-contradicting philosophies of Nature. The individualistic conception of history took its cue from Darwin, with his doctrine of the survival of the fittest. Carlyle's development of personality anticipated Darwin's biological evolution of man. Nietzsche has applied this theory of Darwin to the historical process in the evolution of personality. The doctrine of the survival of the fittest is a biological doctrine; consequently both Carlyle and Nietzsche took their inspiration from biological nature, of which the jungle is the highest form. In the jungle the overpowering animal personality alone rules, the strongest reigns supreme. But Karl Marx calls his philosophy of history materialistic, not only because of his conviction, that material things alone move men to action, but because he drew his inspiration, not from biological nature, but from inanimate nature, from the world of dead matter, which is governed by the law of cause and effect only.

Marx's philosophy of history was greatly influenced by that of the German philosopher Hegel. Change, says Hegel, is the form in which an unchanging absolute, which he calls "logos", reveals itself. Every true manifestation of the logos discloses itself in three stages. First, there is the creative idea or thesis, which being in a constant state of flux leads irresistibly to the formation of its opposite idea which Hegel calls the antithesis. The thesis and antithesis battle with one another and out of their conflict a new and higher truth emerges which he calls the synthesis. This synthesis, in turn, again becomes a thesis, give rise to its counterpart, the antithesis, with which it battles to form a new and still higher idea, the new synthesis. This process continues to function unendingly, leading always to an ever higher and more developed synthesis. This philosophic conflict is known as the triadic rhythm.

Marx borrowed Hegel's triadic rhythm, but applied it in a restricted sense to materialism, and evolved what he calls his "dialectic materialism." Lenin called "dialectic materialism", the living soul of Marxism, "its fundamental theoretical root." Marx contended that labor is the thesis, capital the antithesis, and the classless society is the synthesis. But here the triadic rhythm ends, and it can be seen, therefore, that Marx's application of Hegel's formula has produced only a limited triadic rhythm. Although Karl Marx was a left Hegelian, he was much more anchored philosophically in the French materialism of the eighteenth century, of Diderot and Lamettrie, who contended that man was a machine, than in German idealistic philosophy of the nineteenth century.

According to Karl Marx, the development of a system of production, based upon the notion of private property, divided society into classes and brought the state into being.

The state is, therefore, a class organization organized for the protection of the interests of the possessing group against the nonpossessing classes. It stands for the protection of private property, and the power to continue to exploit the masses.

Karl Marx contends, however, that the overthrow of the exploiting class, the abolition of private property, the disappearance of class distinctions, and the establishment of a classless society will abolish the need for the state, and will make it entirely superfluous. The state will not be needed for exploitation, since this will be done away with. Neither will the state be needed to carry out economic functions, since these will be performed far more efficiently by economic organizations. Nor will the state be needed to exercise police functions, since private property and class inequality, the causes of crime, will no longer exist. The state will then wither away and a stateless, classless society will be born. Marx nowhere describes the new society which is to replace the old. He declares that each revolution will produce its own laws and systems.

Marx was one of the first men of the nineteenth century to raise the question of the historical destinies of man, and he answered it in his own way. The historical destinies of man are to make possible the economically satisfied masses. This satisfaction can be brought about only by collectivizing production and the distribution of goods and by taking out the private profit of all business. The intellectual reaction to Marx was Thomas Carlyle, and later Friedrich Nietzsche, just as the political reaction to Lenin was, first, Mussolini and later Hitler and Stalin. These speculations regarding man's historical destinies have fired the imagination of other notable contemporaries and have brought forth a number of other interesting philosophical interpretations of history which contradict both Karl Marx and his antagonists, Carlyle and Nietzsche. The great Russian writer, Leo Tolstoi, disgusted with Marxian materialism and Nietzschean sensuousness, proclaimed the doctrine of the pure and pious soul as the goal of history. To purify the soul and to become holy, man has to abandon both pleasure and the search for wealth. He must try to overcome his senses, and attain peace of mind and serenity. This relapse into a mild Buddhism found its reaction in Freud, who proclaimed aloud that man is not primarily a food seeker as is claimed by Karl Marx, or a holiness seeker as maintained by Tolstoi, but that man is primarily a sensuous being, whose actions are motivated by sex and not by hunger or holiness. Man must satisfy his sexual urges, that is his first and last motive in all his actions. Wagner's doctrine of the primacy of force epitomized by the mythological deities, and Bergson's doctrine of the instincts and urges, are only corollaries of the personality doctrines of Carlyle and Nietzsche.

The primacy of hunger, power of personality, pure sex and antisex of holiness are the great motives of the modern philosophy of history, but none has made such a powerful appeal to the masses as that of Karl Marx, who today is the most disputed, the most discussed, and most contested figure in modern history. Today the modern world is divided into two groups, the Marxists and anti-Marxists. The anti-Marxian again is also divided into two camps, the Fascist and anti-Fascist. For the rise of fascism, Marx alone is responsible. The rise and development of this powerful force in contemporary history is solely due to the false phophecy of Karl Marx, who predicted that the modern economic process will lead to the elimination of the middle classes and to the formation of two classes only—the working and the capitalist class. The working class will be the overwhelming majority and the capitalist class a negligible minority. It stands to reason, says Marx, that the vast majority will not permit the small minority to exploit it, and in the course of a revolution will take the power away from it, and introduce through the dictatorship of the proletariat the Communist order of things. But what has really happened is this: The middle class, instead of decreasing in numbers as Karl Marx predicted, grew numerically stronger from decade to decade. Today it can challenge both capital and labor.

This middle class today, and not the small capitalist group, is disputing the position of communism in the world and is fighting communism. The middle class is more avaricious than the big capitalists. Its horizon is small and its perspective narrow. It is more afraid of losing what it has than is big capital. Besides the class of the very rich is not of recent date. It has traditions and perspectives and it takes a calm view of things. The middle class is only 100 years old, a new arrival, which is very jealous of its possessions, and it is easily frightened by rebellion. From its point of view, communism is coequal with compulsory proletarization. The fear of communism on the part of the middle classes is the source of strength of all Fascist movements. It is more anti-Communist, it is more terrorized by communism than the upper classes. Switzerland and Yugoslavia, the two European middle-class nations, have not recognized Russia yet, and Holland, the middle-class nation, is more frightened by communism than rich England and France. To fight it successfully and to form an iron wall against any further expansion of communism, fascism has adopted all the methods of the Inquisition—concentration camps, dictatorships, torture chambers, spying systems, and the deification of the State. Since communism has created for the workers a devil, in the form of capitalists, the Fascists have created for their own adherents an imaginary bogey in the form of communism. Both know that their followers have to have a great object of hate and both give them that object. Both dictatorships need these bogeys to maintain themselves in power.

The division of western humanity into Communist and Fascist places the liberals in a tragic position. The liberals, too, belong to the middle classes. They represent the older and more rooted element of the middle classes—people who are not easily frightened and who take a calmer view of things. These liberals understand the limitations and the shortcomings of communism. They understand that it is a one-sided proposition and that it will never become a tenet of all humanity. They wait for the day when communism in Russia will undergo liberal changes and will adjust itself more to western conditions. These liberals are anti-Communist, but they are also anti-Fascist. They believe in democracy and reject fascism and communism as incompatible with true liberalism. They see in both fascism and communism medieval forms of economics and politics. In the Middle Ages life was regulated by authoritarian and totalitarian powers. The individual was deprived of all freedom. In the Fascist and Communist states human life is mechanized and human beings reduced to the position of machines, without freedom to think or to speak their own mind. Just as democracy rejects both fascism and communism, so both reject democracy as incompatible with their own doctrines. However, their fight with both sinister forces is just a sideshow. The main show is a life and death struggle between fascism and communism, and the success and failure of fascism depends upon the success and failure of communism.

Fascism is a reaction to communism, and the historical experience of the last 20 years bears out this thesis. Mussolini was the answer to Lenin and Hitler the response to Stalin. Marxism in its present form is an intellectual proposition. To the present day the representatives of communism claim that they represent the scientific point of view and that their economic doctrines are based on science only, while the economic doctrines of their Fascist antagonists are based on superstition, traditionalism, mysticism, or ignorance. As a matter of fact, Engels, the collaborator of Karl Marx, claims that Marx was the first scientific economist of modern times. Whether we think that Marx's claims to science have a basis in reality or not, the fact that they are being made proves that Marxism is consciously, at least, a rationalist phenomenon. The Facists, however, admit that they are opposed to rationalism, to intellectualism, and to pure science, and are guided by emotions. It is possible to argue with reason, even if it be beclouded, as is the case with every dogmatic. The place to argue this proposition is not the schoolroom, but the legislative hall, where laws are enacted for the nation and where every legislator seeks a wider orientation and real intellectual enlightenment on the laws for which he will be called upon to vote.

Mr. Speaker, let me therefore briefly recapitulate some of the fundamental concepts in the trends of contemporary history that I have thus far stated in my address.

The attempt to liberate man economically following upon the attempt to emancipate man religiously by the Reformation and politically by the French Revolution has culminated in a struggle whose outcome may spell the end of western civilization unless liberal America, headed by President Roosevelt, succeeds in preserving for man the great spiritual heritage of the Reformation and the Renaissance. The present struggle is economic in character and is fought today by two contending groups, the Communists and the Fascists. The one group, swearing by Karl Marx, is materialistic and tries to reduce the entire cultural process to an economic process. Karl Marx has invented a man, the homo economicus, the hungry man, who as an isolated type is a pure myth, for this homo economicus does not exist in reality. Man is not only a hungry man but is also a thinking man, a feeling man, a playing man, an ambitious man, a spiritual man. The color white is composed of its spectroscopic colors—violet, blue, green, indigo, yellow, orange, and red. So likewise, man consists of all his attributes, and not of one of them. Just as communism has created a myth, the hungry man, to establish its rule, so has fascism created another myth, the instinctive man, who is thirsty for power to establish his domination. The instinctive man of the Fascist is no more a reality than is the economic man of the Marxists, for man is not only hungry for power but also for beauty and truth. The fight between the Communists and the Fascists is really a fight about the one or the other attribute of man and not about man in general. In the course of this struggle man is being disfigured, for he is being turned into a beast, either a devouring or a domineering beast. It took humanity thousands of years to establish the truth of the spiritual personality of man and of man's totality of personality. The prophets of Israel, Socrates, Plato, Jesus, the Reformation, the Renaissance, Kant, have all taught one great truth, the spiritual personality and spiritual character of man. They all established the truth that man is a citizen of two worlds, the sensuous and supersensuous, and that man has therefore double functions to perform and double duties to fulfill, morally and spiritually. But in the fight of the Communists and the Fascists for the domination of man the latter is reduced to a caricature of real humanity; he is deprived of his spiritual personality and is presented either as a machine, as is the case with Marxian philosophy, which drew its inspiration from French materialism of the eighteenth century, or as a beast, as is the case with Nazis. The greatest teacher of Nazism, Spengler, says: "Man is a beast, and the beast must be curbed, and only the totalitarian state can curb him." The materialistic economists say that man is a machine and has to be driven like a machine and only the dictatorial state can drive him.

The New Deal, on the other hand, as formulated by President Roosevelt, clings tenaciously to the eternal truth that man is a spiritual being and that he is a being of many attributes and, like the color white, cannot be divided into component parts without destroying him. The real philosophy of the New Deal is an effort to preserve the totality of man's personality in the midst of so many attempts to destroy it. The New Deal is a Biblical proposition and President Roosevelt is a Biblical character, because both insist upon the spiritual character of man, who must never be a means to an end but always an end in himself. Consequently he must never be exploited, oppressed, or humiliated. He can never be either a machine or a beast of burden, but must always be treated like a human being, with respect and dignity. The legislation of the New Deal has this object in view: To preserve the dignity of man, so that he be in a position to give the best that is in him to his fellow man. [Applause.] This necessitates the curbing of rugged individualism, which has degenerated into ragged individualism, and bringing about a just distribution of wealth without however destroying the basis of our civilization. The totality of human personality, which is the combination of all of man's urges and instincts, stands for evolution and not for revolution, but whoever identifies man with any one of his instincts, such as hunger, sex, holiness, personality, or the will to power, which is a disintegrated part of the totality of human personality, must stand for revolution, for bloodshed, and for cruelty, and must destroy the image of God in man. The struggle, therefore, between these three contending forces—communism, fascism, and the New Deal—simmers down to a struggle for either the totality or the partiality of the human personality. Either man is identical with all of his attributes or he is identical with any of his many attributes; in short, he is either man or beast. On the basis of the totality of man's personality, humanity has established a culture and a civilization. To preserve it and to guard it is the primary motive and ultimate task of the New Deal. To destroy that culture and civilization and to introduce instead regulated jungle, either in the form of fascism or communism, is the primary motive and ultimate task of either communism or fascism.

To us who believe in the ultimate victory of man's highest ideals there can be no doubt that President Roosevelt will emerge victor from this world historic struggle. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, let me therefore attempt to dissect the five fundamental principles underlying Marxian socialism, as conceived by Karl Marx in his tremendous work, Das Kapital, and his Communist Manifesto, which have been translated into every civilized language of the world, and which are the foundation upon which the superstructure of communism and socialism have been evolved. The first, the Economic Interpretation of History:

> In every historic epoch—
> Reads the preface to the Communist Manifesto—
> the prevailing mode of economic production and exchange, and the social organization necessarily following from it, is the basis upon which is built up, and from which alone can be explained, the political and intellectual history of that epoch.

What is my answer to Karl Marx's economic interpretation of history? Mr. Speaker, whoever is familiar with the Marxist theory will admit that it stands and falls with his economic and materialistic conception of history. Karl Marx contends that the all-driving power in history is economics, the hungry man, or the "homo economicus."

We admit that man is hungry, but we know that he is thirsty, too, thirsty not only for water but for knowledge, for beauty, for inspiration, and that he is ever ready to sacrifice himself for quenching of this thirst, as he is ready to do all kinds of things to satisfy his hunger.

The difference between us and Karl Marx is that we are not denying that man is hungry, but we challenge the assertion that he is driven by hunger only. The hungry man of Karl Marx is a myth. He has never existed and never will exist. Since Marx insists that man's reality is hunger only, it goes without saying that the history of the world should be a history of economic struggles only.

Neither Marx himself nor any of his followers have ever even attempted to explain the first 300 years of Christian history in terms of Marxist history. When tens of thousands of pious men and women adopted Christianity, in spite of the dangers and perils to which they would be subjected, did they do it for economic reasons? Or is it not true that adopting Christianity meant sacrificing everything, not only their properties but also their liberties and their very lives? Of course, you all know the history of early Christianity with its martyrdom and tragedies. You all know the history of revolutions and the tragic fate of revolutionary leaders. Did the thousands and tens of thousands of Russian revolutionists who in adopting the cause of revolution sacrificed their stations in life, their liberties, their privileges, do it only to gain material wealth? Again I say no. Is not the heroism and self-sacrificing idealism of the Russian revolutionary leaders, and even of the masses of the Russian revolution, a living denial of the Marxist interpretation of history? Who can explain the Huguenot movement in Marxist terms? Who can explain the history of the victims of the Spanish Inquisition in Marxist terms? Here was a group of well-to-do people, deeply rooted in the soil, with the tradition of thousands of years, that preferred exile and torture of body and mind to peace of mind and material happiness only because it would not yield to the purely abstract principle of religious conversion. This history of all nonconformist movements in the world is the very contradiction of the Marxist interpretation of history. Today, 140 years after the French Revolution, we know from its greatest historians, Lavisse, Hanataux, and Jaures, that while famine was one of the incentives of the revolution, it was not its main motive power. Its main motive was the will to power of a rising middle class and the attempt to take away the power from the other classes. Nobody denies that economics was one of the motives of the French Revolution, but no historian today admits that it was the prime and only motive. To Karl Marx, however, it was the only motive.

The greatest and most convincing proof against Marxism is Marx himself. Marxism was not created by the hungry masses about which he speaks, but by a powerful, bitter, and rebellious personality called Karl Marx, who was not a workingman himself, but the son of a middle-class lawyer. There were many shades of socialism before Marx, but Marxism was produced by a personality called Karl Marx and this personality produced a doctrine pronouncing the death sentence against all personality. Marxism, if honestly applied, spells the death of all personality. When you say absolute economic equality, you deny personality. You cannot have both personality and equality. Of all the philosophies of history, created during the nineteenth century, Marxism alone has survived, because it is first a tenet of great personality; second, because it has a great deal of truth in it; third, because it has a greater appeal to the masses of the people than any other conception of history, for it appeals to the belly and not to the mind; and fourth, because of its one-sidedness, giving it the character of religion. If Karl Marx had come along with the proposition that economics is one of the most important factors of history, everyone would have applauded him, and he would be only one of the many philosophers of history. But since he said economics is the only factor in history, the hungry part of humanity applauded him and the satisfied part of humanity cursed him. Marx knew perfectly well that the masses are only guided by slogans and not by subtle intellectual analysis and considerations. He knew that only one idea powerfully expressed would hit and impress the masses and he proved to be right. By assuming that the materialistic conception of history was his innermost conviction of the way the historical process moves he visualized not only a tensionless state and society which is a sort of a sociological nirvana, but he dug the deepest grave for the personality, which is the only source of all creativeness. The creative mind deals with formulas, terms, notions, and ideas, which are manifestations of the intellectual analytical mind. Therefore, in the realm of the mind, you cannot have intellectual equality. Since the creative mind develops wealth, you cannot have economic equality. Equality is not to be found in nature at all. It must be superimposed by force upon man.

Karl Marx's conception of economic equality cannot be translated into a reality without dictatorship, concentration camps, civil war, and the abolition of the rights of man. If religious equality, as Torquemada understood it, was not possible without an inquisition, economic equality, as Karl Marx proposed it as the consequence of his conception of historic materialism, is not possible even with five inquisitions. Economic equality presumes not only economic straitjacketing of the individual but also intellectual imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, such are the consequences of the materialistic conception of history. It is unrealistic and false in its presumptions and it is tragic in its consequences. Marx's dictum that not the mind makes man's life, but that economic conditions make man's mind, is the greatest violation of the truth ever committed by man, for the fact is that all economic progress and also social and political progress are the products of man's creative mind. Up to the machine age humanity was divided into two classes—the feudal and the peasant class, with the masses of the people being very poor. The middle class was created by the machine civilization. The life of the modern workingman is surely not the life of a pauper. This economic improvement all along the line is due to the machine, and the machine was created by man's mind. It presumes mathematics and physics, mechanics and chemistry. A new engineering principle leading to the creation of the automobile industry, a principle born in man's creative mind, has proved to be a source of wealth and employment to millions of people. The discovery of the Hertzian waves by the late Professor Hertz, a Jewish physicist in Germany, led to the establishment of the radio industry, giving employment to hundreds of thousands of people and a source of wealth to those who know best how to handle it. The same holds good of many other purely abstract principles invented by man's creative mind, whose translation into reality revolutionized our entire economic life. Thus it is not economic life that shapes man's consciousness, but it is man's consciousness that shapes man's life even economically.

Mr. Speaker, "homo sapiens" means thinking man, living man, enterprising man, playful man, searching man, and consequently human history cannot be only economic history, determined by materialistic factors alone. Man is the only animal who is never satisfied; he never has enough. Man's rise to power was brought about by his will to more, and while this will to more, if given full sway, must lead to jungle rule, it cannot be entirely curbed, even economically. This psychological law governing man—the variety of man's desires and aspirations and the inability to satisfy any of his desires completely—reduces Marx's interpretation of history to a dogma, to an article of creed or belief. Belief and creed are not philosophy. Marx's conception of history, therefore, is dogmatic or theological, but not philosophical.

It has been established again and again that Marx was, in his general philosophical views, a follower of eighteenth-century materialism and that his so-called materialistic philosophy of history, far from being a byproduct or a development of the philosophy of Hegel, which was purely logical, is only a continuation of his general materialistic philosophy. Since no materialistic philosopher has ever demonstrated how dead matter can transform itself into a mind or consciousness, materialism as a philosophy is considered today a mere superstition. It is the most unsatisfactory of all answers to the puzzles of life. While no materialistic philosopher has ever demonstrated the possibility of deducing mind from matter, all great philosophers have demonstrated that all human reality is the product of the human mind. Man alone is the tool-making creature because he has a mind to create tools with. This tool-making ability created for him his economic problems. Only man has economic problems—animals have no economic problems, because they have no creative consciousness.

All material human reality as well as all spiritual human reality is born of the mind and not of dead matter. With the help of the principles of mathematics, which are born in our mind, and with the help of the principles of theoretical physics, which are born in our mind, we create means of transportation, machines, and in short, our civilization. A new principle of mathematics or engineering which is born in man's mind may revolutionize the entire economic fabric. If human economics is a continuation of the human mind, the mind comes first and matter or material comes second. The materialistic conception of history is, therefore, subjectively and objectively false; it is plain superstition and a gross form of mysticism.

> The history of all hitherto existing society—
> Begins the Manifesto—
> is the history of class struggles. Freeman and slave, patrician and plebeian, lord and serf, guildmaster and journeyman, in a word, oppressor and oppressed, stood in constant opposition to one another, carried on an uninterrupted fight, now hidden, now open, a fight that each time ended either in a revolutionary reconstitution of society at large or in the common ruin of the contesting classes.

What is my reply to this principle of the "class struggle"? To Karl Marx, the content of the world historic process is a struggle between economic classes, between the master and the slave in ancient times, between the feudal lord and the serf or retainer in the middle ages, and between the capitalists and workingmen of modern times. Class to him means primarily an economic class.

There is a twofold objection to this theory: First, the content of history is not always an economic class struggle; and, second, the classes are not always economic classes. As a matter of fact, the class is not a historical category but a psychological category, developed not only by historical forces from without but by psychological forces from within, and that the struggle of the classes is not always determined by economic factors. There is, first, the struggle of the sexes; second, the struggle of ideas; third, the struggle of religion; and, fourth, the struggle for political power motivated by the will to rule or by the will to get more. There is a class of lettered and a class of illiterate people; the one hates the other. There is a class of gifted and a class of nongifted people; the one hates the other. There is a class of ambitious and a class of sullen people; the one hates the other—and the greatest struggles of history were not only fought out by economic groups, the poor against the rich, but by different religions. The Crusades were religious wars. The Thirty Years War was a religious war. The Seven Years War was a war of Protestant Prussia against Catholic Austria. Most civil wars originate in difference in ideas as well as difference of interests. Even the civil war in Spain is as much a war of ideas as a war of interests.

Since the class is at least as much a psychological as an economic category, and as a psychological category will always be in existence, the proposal of a classless society is bereft of all realism. In Communist Russia today there are as many classes as in any other capitalist country. The official who gets a salary of 3,000 rubles a month has no more in common with the laborer, who draws only a salary of 200 rubles a month, than has the capitalist in the capitalist country in common with the laborer whom he employs.

The third basic contention of Karl Marx is his principle of surplus value. The fundamental doctrine of Marx's economic system and the central theme of Das Kapital is known as the theory of surplus value.

According to Marx, the exchange or market value of a commodity depends upon the amount and degree of labor necessary to produce it. He defines a commodity as a "mass of congealed labor-time." Labor is therefore the source of all value. It is likewise the measure of value, as "commodities in which quantities of labor are embodied or which can be produced in the same time have the same value."

What is the philosophy underlying surplus value? According to Marx, the exchange or market value of a commodity depends upon the amount or degree of labor necessary to produce that article or commodity. By labor Marx means, not that of an individual, but socially necessary labor time that is required to produce a commodity under formal conditions. It includes the labor of highly paid managers as well as that of poorly paid operators.

But the laborer does not receive the full product of his toil, only barely enough to maintain himself and continue to produce. Of course, this theory of surplus value is not Marx's creation. He accepted the theory of wages formulated by the classical economists of modern times. According to this theory, the laborer can get only the mere sustenance under the existing conditions. A contemporary of Karl Marx, Ferdinan La Salle, called this wage theory "the iron wage law." The fact cannot be denied that under the old deal labor was shamefully exploited. In the western democratic countries, however, the worker has not only political but also personal freedom, which is denied to him, however, in dictatorial lands. There not only strikes are forbidden but no worker may leave his job or his abode without the consent of the government. In all Fascist countries the worker is practically a state slave, compelled to take the wage given him by the state and forbidden to express dissatisfaction with his lot. No privilege of which he is the recipient, such as unemployment insurance, socialized medicine, recreation and vacation privileges, can compensate him for his loss of freedom.

In any free democracy it is obviously wrong and unjust that a small group of men organized in a corporation, whose destinies they control, should take all the surplus values created by labor, and be permitted to accumulate infinite wealth, which it later uses or misuses to strengthen its own position economically, politically, and socially. The solution to the problem of surplus value is not the Utopia of absolute economic equality as visualized by Karl Marx, because such equality cannot be brought about without inquisitions, torture chambers, and dictatorships. Our old economic conceptions that labor is entitled to wages only are remnants of a feudalistic age. To solve the problems of surplus value, labor should be entitled, not only to decent wages but also to a fair share of the profits.

The surplus value theory of Karl Marx to the effect that all wealth has its source in labor is only partly true, for wealth has also its source in human inventiveness, in the human creative genius whose economic value cannot be fixed at all—in human skill and demands for goods, which are often developed by purely spiritual factors. It is not true that the market value of a commodity always depends upon the amount and degree of labor necessary to produce it. It also depends upon other factors, such as demand for that commodity, the risk connected with producing it, the inventiveness and skill necessary to create it—in short, it depends upon a number of external and internal conditions over which labor has no control at all and whose value cannot be fixed.

Labor is one of the principal sources of value, but not the only source. It is true that the workingman constructs the machine, but who is going to evaluate the work of the inventive engineer who invented the machine and who can evaluate the mathematical and physical principles upon which the machine is built? To say that labor is the only source of wealth is to place a negative economic evaluation upon man's creative genius. It is true, however, that labor to a great extent is the source of modern wealth. But the answer to the problem arising from this phenomenon is not old Marxism but the New Deal, which subjects accumulated wealth to a process of attrition and aspires to the establishment of an economic balance, giving the poor more and the rich less. It seems to me that there is more realism and more objective truth in the New Deal than in Karl Marx and all his interpreters combined. The law of surplus value, therefore, is as little valid as the theory of the class struggle or the economic process of history. The class struggle today throughout the world is the conflict between capitalism and communism. Classical capitalism is the exploitation of labor by capital. Classical communism is the exploitation of capital by labor. The New Deal democracy synthesizes these two opposing forces, by regulating capital and cooperating with labor, to bring the greatest good to the greatest number, so that labor may receive a fairer share of the distribution of the wealth that it creates without crippling or destroying invested capital. [Applause.]

The fourth important concept of Karl Marx is his tremendous argument pleading for the "inevitability of socialism." What does Karl Marx say about this subject? He says:

> Capitalism produces, above all, its own gravediggers. Centralization of industry and of labor is, according to Marx, the inevitable tendency of the modern system of production; more and more will the capitalists combine and wealth will be consequently in fewer and fewer hands. As with capital, so with labor. The factory tends to centralize many laborers of different trades and localities and to reduce them to a common wage level. Their lot will steadily grow worse, till finally they are reduced to a state of semipauperism.

The theory of increasing misery advanced by Marx is based upon his belief that the workingmen, because of their low wages, have no purchasing or consuming power and are unable to buy the enormous quantities of goods produced by machinery.

What is my answer to this economic contention of Karl Marx? According to Karl Marx, the Socialist state or the classless state is predetermined by the entire economic process and its arrival is inevitable. This inevitability of socialism Marx deduces from the increasing misery of the masses. According to his calculations, the capitalistic order of things, leading to monopolies and trusts, will destroy the middle classes and in the end there will be only two classes—the working men, who form the majority, and a small capitalist class. The majority will seize power, overcome the capitalist class, and introduce a socialist order. But the economic development of the last 75 years shows that the middle class, far from decreasing in numbers, is constantly increasing in numbers and is constantly gathering strength. Today it is so powerful that in many countries it is the ruling class. It can be the ruling class in every country if it chooses to cooperate either with the workingmen or with the capitalists. Modern legislation in every civilized state tends to limit the power of accumulated capital and to strengthen the middle class. The middle classes are by inclination both antifascist and anticommunist. They are democratically inclined. The inevitability of socialism is a false prophecy based on entirely false calculations. The very fact that communism faces everywhere capitalistic fascism as its enemy, and that both forms of dictatorship are being fought by the democratic middle classes everywhere, demonstrates clearly the falsity of Karl Marx's theory of the destruction of the middle classes and the inevitability of socialism.

Finally we come to the fifth contention of Karl Marx, which is the principle of "internationalism." Karl Marx states: "The proletarians have nothing to lose but their chains; they have a whole world to win." "Workingmen of all countries, unite!"

My answer to the subject of "internationalism" is:

For the last 500 years western history was a history of nations and nationalism. The highest development of western nationalism coincides with the development of our industrial civilization and with the spiritual deepening of the cultures of the major nations. "Nationalism", in the best meaning of the term, is as much a part of white man's reality as is religion, art, literature, and science. The cosmopolitan idea of the French Revolution was nationalistic in its motive. For the French cosmopolites said to the non-French people, "You adopt spiritual France as your fatherland and you will be saved." Today, when Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin shape the destinies of 275,000,000 people in the West and Gandhi and Nehru do the same in the East, nationalism is a greater reality than it was 120 years ago. Hitler and Mussolini, the aggressors, and Gandhi and Nehru, the resisters, are equally nationalistic-minded. They are primarily interested in the welfare of their own people, to which there cannot possibly be any objection. What one must object to is the methods they use, and not to the nationalistic principle they represent.

If it is true that the principle of nationalism and the nationalistic consciousness of people are part of man's psychological reality, then Karl Marx's internationalism, culminating in the idea that the proletarians have no country, but an accidental birthplace, is a perversion of western man's reality. While it may be conceded that some unscrupulous people use patriotism as a refuge and hideout for their corrupt activities, to most people the love for the native country is as genuine as their love for their family. It makes no difference whether the bearer of this love is a workingman, a businessman, or a manufacturer, an artist, or a scientist. To workingmen their native place is as much their country, the land of their ancestors, the land they love, as to any other stratum of society. The internationalism of Karl Marx is nothing but the revival of a medieval idea of the church. The internationalistic representatives of the medieval church thundered against the love of the native soil in the same way as have Karl Marx and his followers for the last 75 years. The medieval church fought with the same energy, determination, and violence against the rising nationalism and for internationalism. Even long after the victory of modern nationalism was achieved through the Reformation and the Renaissance, the representatives of the medieval church continued their fight against nationalism. The activity of the Jesuit order for the first 200 years of its existence was primarily directed against nationalism. The political ideal of the medieval church state was the one and indivisible world state, headed by the Pontiff. The political ideal of Marxism is the one indivisible economic state. Both state ideals are universalistic; that is to say, they do not permit any borderlines and any limitations lest the personality arise. Goethe, the biographer of Saint Ignatius Loyola, says that it was the ideal of the founder of the order to denationalize all nations. The medieval church was as much opposed to individualistic nationalism as Marxian communism is opposed to nationalism as far as theory is concerned. In reality, however, the Catholics are as patriotically inclined as all other groups of the population. The main struggle of Stalin in Russia today is the battle for Russian nationalism as against the internationalism of spitfire Trotzky, who is pursuing his principle of permanent world revolution as advocated by Karl Marx.

The internationalism of Karl Marx is a violation of all human reality, because our love for our country is actually born with us and cannot be destroyed in normal people. Soon after the German declaration of war against France the first thing the German Social Democratic Party, a purely Marxian organization, did was to vote for the imperial war budget, and many German Social Democrats, to prove their superpatriotism, joined the army voluntarily and asked to be sent to the firing line.

The French, the English, the Italian, and Austrian Socialists did the same. This and similar historical experiences show that the workingman is as much concerned with the welfare of his nation in times of national crisis as are the other strata of the population, and that they do not place their class interest above their national interest. The contention of Karl Marx, that the workingmen had nothing to lose but their chains, is just a militant figure of speech. Would the American workingman permit the invasion of cheap labor? Does Communist Russia permit the invasion of Chinese coolies, who would compete with Russian labor? Would the German Republic permit Polish and Russian laborers to invade the country to compete with German labor? There are justified struggles going on within the ranks of labor itself. Skilled labor is in constant struggle against unskilled labor. Technically developed labor is in constant struggle against intruders who are not technologically trained and experienced. There is just as much an aristocracy of labor as there is an aristocracy within any stratum of the population.

Marx's slogan, "Workingmen of all countries, unite", is based on the stated assumption that the workingman of one country has more in common with the workingman of another country than he has with the different classes of his own country. The workingman is as much rooted in the life and traditions of his nation as is the member of any other class. The workingman is swayed by the same emotions as other people, is as much attached to his native soil as are other people and is carried away by the same patriotic feelings as the rest of the population. To say that the workingman of one nation has more in common with the workingman of another nation, implying that he places his economic interests above his other interests, spiritual, religious, patriotic, is libeling the workingman. As a matter of fact there is more community of interests between the mercantile class of different nations than there is between the laboring class of different nations. Business is business, and many a merchant during the war has been guilty of trading with the enemy. Today the French sell war material to the Germans, the English to the Italians, and vice versa, though knowing that this material will some day be used against them. It seems to me that the two most patriotic classes in the Nation are the farmers and the workingman. [Applause.]

It is thus evident that the principal philosophical and psychological theories of Marxism, the economic interpretation of history, the class struggle, the inevitability of socialism and internationalism, are from the point of view of reality, pure fiction. They are illusions of a fanatical mind, and they have no basis in reality.

Mr. Speaker, for almost an hour I have discussed the historical, social, political, economic, and philosophic conceptions of socialism, communism, and fascism. What is the antidote to these economic philosophies that have challenged the democracies the world over?

Mr. Speaker, after centuries of rich intellectual experience, ancient Greece, as represented by one of its great philosophers, Aristotle, came to the conclusion that in matters of the state the golden middle way is the only solution to all political woes and problems of man. As between the leftist tendencies, culminating in collectivism and resulting in the obliteration of personality and in the dictatorship of the proletariat, and the extreme rightist expressing themselves in rugged individualism and resulting in the economic and political exploitation and enslavement of labor, there is the golden middle way of the New Deal. The solution it offers to the economic, social, and political problems of men of our generation is a synthesis of the two driving forces; each of which is anxious to dominate man entirely—individualism and collectivism. The pendulum swings fast and furiously from one extreme to the other. To have discovered its rhythm somewhere in the middle of the way is the immortal deed of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. It is comparable to the triadic rhythm discovered by the great philosopher, Hegel.

The New Deal as an economic and social solution to our problems is not a purely abstract principle. Born out of dire experience, born of the necessities and problems of life, it is more applicable to life than all the theories of the millenium advanced by economists, sociologists, historians, statesmen, and philosophers. The New Deal is primarily concerned with regularizing and improving upon three spheres of man's life—the home, the factory, and man's relationship to Nature. Millions of American homes in the village are denied the facilities and the comforts of the home in the city.

The oil lamp is still the rule in the village home and cooking is a laborious process for the farmer's wife, because unlike the worker's wife in the city, who uses either gas or electricity in the kitchen, she has to rely on wood to prepare meals for the family. To furnish power to a farmer is to make his home life more tolerable and give the farmer's wife a minimum of comforts to which she, too, is entitled. The improvement of the home of the worker in the city is also one of the main objectives of the New Deal. It proposes to lighten the burden of the two frail members of the home—the child and the aged. The New Deal is committed to the abolition of child labor, to give the young ones a chance to develop physically, morally and intellectually. It is committed to old-age pensions, so that the old father and old mother need not be a burden to the children and suffer want in the last years of their life. It is my candid opinion that these measures, supplemented with unemployment insurance for the worker, security of protection for investments of our people, maternity legislation, child welfare, workingmen's compensation, care of youth through Civilian Conservation Corps, and the protection of the blind, crippled, and paralyzed, all, measures adopted by the New Deal, will greatly strengthen the American home and make it more than ever the very basis of our civilization. The inscription of "God bless our home" on the walls of the dwellings of our citizenry will be the epitaph to Franklin D. Roosevelt's struggle to maintain the home, with slums abolished throughout the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the New Deal is not only concerned with offering the members of the home a minimum of worry and a maximum of happiness, but it is also greatly interested in the well-being of the man in the factory, mine, or shop, and to that end, it proposes to enact laws guaranteeing the worker a minimum wage, that is to say, a saving wage, and maximum hours, as well as unemployment insurance. The New Deal contends that man must never be a means to an end, but must always be an end in himself. He must not be enslaved, oppressed, and exploited. If he has to sell his labor to his fellowmen, the least he can expect out of this sale is a sufficient income to give him economic security, to take care of his needs and to enable him to provide for those who are dependent on him—otherwise the labor that he sells is not human labor, but machine labor, or beast of burden labor. But man is not a machine nor a beast of burden, but a spiritual being, for he has responsibilities and problems which neither the machine nor the beast of burden has. All men have to work for a living, but no man should slave for a living, and the maximum-hour principle, stressed by the New Deal as one of the solutions to the problems of mechanized labor, will prevent the enslavement of man. Men will work a given number of hours in the mine, shop, or factory and the balance of his time he will use for his human needs—for the betterment of his domestic life—for the betterment of his social and intellectual life. The maximum-hour law will humanize labor by enabling the working man to participate in all the joys and pleasures of life.

In the Communist state, labor has certain privileges, especially educational and recreational, but the obligation and duties of labor are so terrific that these privileges amount to very little. It is denied all freedom, the right to strike, the right to free movement, even the right to change jobs; in matters of pay it must take what is given to it. It is the aim of the Communist state to exploit labor as much as possible, and it does this very effectively by reducing the working man to a working machine. In the Fascist states labor has all the obligations and duties of the Communist state, but none of its privileges. From the point of view of employer-employee relations, labor is absolutely enslaved in the Communist state as well as in the Fascist state.

The New Deal offers labor a new Magna Carta. By curbing rugged individualism through collective bargaining, and compelling it to do justice to labor, it transforms labor machines into free workingmen and thus raises the dignity of labor. Labor should not be autocratic and arbitrary in its demands. It should not endeavor to exploit and destroy honest capital. Only by meting out justice to labor and capital will the social unrest disappear and our present economic order be saved. That capital does not see it and does not express its gratitude to Franklin D. Roosevelt, the creator of the New Deal, is one of the greatest paradoxes of our time.

Mr. Speaker, the third link in the chain of the New Deal is man's relationship to nature. To the extent that nature is a source of joy to man, it has been so far, the property of the few, of the classes, and not of the many, of the masses. The classes can afford the luxury of travel, the luxury of everything the eyes take delight in, new scenery and new sights. Through a reorganized merchant marine and the use of the automobile the American workers will be enabled to travel during their vacation time, to enjoy fresh air, to see new scenes and to enrich their life with new experiences. Summer camps for poor children to continue their education in the country is the next move in the onward march of developing the youth of our country, our future citizens.

Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege, indeed, for me to address myself to you sitting in the middle of the House listening to my remarks. I can well remember many years ago when you asked me to speak for the Sheppard-Bankhead bill that would make it possible for the Government of the United States to appropriate money to take care of the maternal welfare of those of our mothers throughout the Nation who were dying with puerperal sepsis because they were confined by some unclean person working on the farm. No doctor, midwife, or nurse was there to take care of them and provide for their physical comfort. Hundreds of thousands of mothers of that type have died upon the altar of childbirth. It is such humane legislation as you have sponsored, as typified by the Sheppard-Bankhead bill, that is now incorporated in the social-security bill, that is taking care of thousands of innocent mothers by having trained doctors, midwives, and nurses look after them in their hour of anguish and labor pain they undergo in bringing a child into the world.

While speaking for the preservation of the home and bringing justice to the working people of our country, let us not forget the sacrifices that have been made by our colleagues on the floor of this House, who have died in the performance of their duties. They battled for the preservation of the home and for the day when labor can secure a better distribution of the wealth it creates. Let us not forget the tragic death of our beloved humanitarian colleague, who has made the eternal pilgrimage from whence no traveler ever returns, BILL CONNERY. He will live in the memory of those who love him as an exponent of everything that is sweet and beautiful in ennobling labor and giving of his today that the laboring man may have his tomorrow.

Thus while Marxism promises a dictatorship of the proletariat which in fact has proved to be a source of oppression and enslavement of labor and while fascism promises the disappearance of social unrest by equally enslaving labor, and while both at the same time destroy capitalism, the one totally and the other partially, the New Deal, taking the middle of the road, opens new vistas to labor, guaranteeing a secure and dignified existence, and at the same time leaving our present capitalistic order intact, thus avoiding revolution and bloodshed.

The Bible gave man the new deal for the first time in the world's history. Then the Reformation and the Renaissance gave man a new deal for the second time, because the postulates of the first new deal were forgotten. Now, man is receiving a new deal for the third time, because the postulates of the second new deal were forgotten. It is for that reason that the personality of Franklin Delano Roosevelt is only comparable to that of the great figures of the Bible or to the great figures of the Reformation and the Renaissance. May God bless our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and give him strength and good health to realize all the ideals of the New Deal. May he put into realization the spiritual message of our forbears, when they gave us as our shibboleth and slogan the inspired words, "E pluribus unum." Out of many people let us have one united group of American citizens, all enjoying a totality of personality that will bring happiness into the hearts of our American people, and contentment in the home, hearth, and fireside of every American. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to ask a question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe that when the culture of a nation dies, the nation dies. I think it is well for us in this great legislative body, where we have material things before us continually, to be elevated and entranced, as I have been by this marvelous and brilliant speech of the gentleman from New York.

May I ask the gentleman his thought with regard to the freedom of the press in this country as compared with the treatment of the press in Communistic and Fascist countries?

Mr. SIROVICH. In the Fascist countries of Europe there is no freedom of the press. There is no freedom for the press of foreign countries to pillory, to excoriate, to denounce, to tell falsehoods, or even to tell the truth about public officials. The editors would be sent to jail and concentration camps for casting aspersions upon rulers or dictators and their papers suppressed.

As an evidence of what our great institution of democracy is doing, behold our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, when he goes to the Gridiron Club. Here in the presence of the most eminent and distinguished men who run the press of the Nation the President good naturedly sits mute while he allows in panorama to march across the proscenium of time all of his actions, his conduct, and his deeds. The newspaper men roast the President across the gridiron for 2 hours. They lampoon him, ridicule him, laugh at him, pillory him, and he even greatly enjoys these blessings. We Members of Congress are often deeply wounded by unfair criticism, unjust and uncalled-for aspersions, unwarranted and cruel deductions, but in spite of it all there is not a Member of Congress who would vote to destroy the freedom of our press. The freedom of newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and publications to publish news uncensored, unrestricted, and untrammeled must live on to guard and perpetuate our democratic republican institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with intense interest to the very able and instructive address of our distinguished colleague from New York. He has been endowed with splendid talents of retentive genius, historical knowledge, marvelous memory, and clarity of utterance, and he has brought them to us again today. I believe that the highest traditions of the House live again in the speech delivered this afternoon by our colleague. I compliment him with every sincerity of my heart. [Applause.]

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] may proceed for 2 additional minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New York tell us the difference between an organism and a mechanism?

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, when a child comes into the world, whether it be an embryo or a fetus, it comes in as an organism. It comes in intact; every part that Nature has given it is there. No part is added to it from the outside. Its motive power comes from within.

A machine or mechanism, on the other hand, must be made piecemeal, from part to part, and when the parts are all put together, its motive power or the force that motivates its movement must come from without.

Therefore, no human being should be made a slave or servant of a machine, but every human organism ought to be treated with dignity, with graciousness, with humanity. An organism is created by divine Spirit. A machine is only made by human hand. Man should therefore be master of the machine, and not its servant. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HILL of Washington, for 1 day, on account of official business.

To Mr. LANZETTA, for 1 day, on account of important business.

To Mr. KLEBERG (at the request of Mr. WEST), for 1 day, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. THOMASON of Texas (at the request of Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON), for 1 day, on account of important business.

To Mr. MITCHELL, for 1 week, on account of urgent business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'CONNELL of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two short letters written by Arthur L. Johnson, formerly general legislative chairman of the Townsend organization, explaining his stand on the recent Townsend destruction, which explains my position thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

H. J. Res. 415. Joint resolution making an appropriation to defray expenses incident to the dedication of chapels and other World War memorials erected in Europe, and for other purposes.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES, NATIONAL BITUMINOUS COAL COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 85)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Department of the Interior, National Bituminous Coal Commission, for the fiscal year 1938, amounting to $3,300,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS IN 1937 (S. DOC. NO. 84)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Administrator of the Resettlement Administration, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 119 (agreed to Apr. 22, 1937), a statement with reference to the relief of flood sufferers in the floods of 1937, which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REPORT OF SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION—PART II, COMMITTEES AND CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a further report on the study and investigation of the work, activities, personnel, and functions of protective and reorganization committees, being Part II, Committees and Conflicts of Interest, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to continue their appropriations to the Public Works Administration for non-Federal public works

Whereas there is urgent necessity that the State of Michigan continue its building program for State institutions; and

Whereas the funds available for such appropriations in the State of Michigan are not adequate to immediately meet the situation; and

Whereas the Federal Public Works Administration has heretofore assisted the State of Michigan in a valuable and beneficial way in the construction of new buildings at State institutions; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States now has under consideration the question of further appropriations for the Public Works Administration; and

Whereas the State administrative board will be authorized to apply to the Federal Government for assistance in the furtherance of an institutional building program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States continue their valuable assistance rendered through the Public Works Administration; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States and each United States Senator and Congressman from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and Congress to take such steps as may be necessary to cut a channel through the southerly end of the Coronado Silver Strand to allow seagoing vessels to enter the bay of San Diego at its southerly end

Whereas the bay of San Diego possesses one of the finest harbors in the world; and

Whereas the fleet of the United States of America makes extensive use of said bay; and

Whereas there is only one entrance to said bay, which condition would constitute an extreme hazard to said fleet in the event of war; and

Whereas the construction of a channel through the southerly end of the Coronado Silver Strand would permit of a segregation of the vessels of the United States from ordinary commerce, and thus facilitate the use of said bay by both classes of vessels, and also render the bay more valuable in time of war: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby memorializes and petitions the President and the Congress of the United States to take such steps as may be necessary to cut a channel through the southerly end of the Coronado Silver Strand to allow seagoing vessels to enter the bay of San Diego at its southerly end; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully requested to urge such action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to amend the Social Security Act so as to enable such States as may desire to do so to bring the employees of such State and the employees of its counties, cities, and other political subdivisions within the provisions of such act relating to old-age benefits

Whereas the Federal Social Security Act exempts from the old-age benefit provisions of such act persons performing service in the employ of a State or political subdivision thereof; and

Whereas thousands of employees of the State of California and of its counties, cities, and other political subdivisions are desirous of securing the old-age benefits provided for by the Federal Security Act now denied by them: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States to enact legislation amending the Federal Social Security Act so as to enable any State that may desire to do so to bring the employees of such State, and the employees of its counties, cities, and other political subdivisions, within the beneficent provisions of said act relating to old-age benefits; further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and such Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from California are respectfully urged to support such legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the Congress of the United States to designate Armistice Day as a holiday

Whereas the 11th day of November is the day when all persons throughout the civilized world celebrate the return of peace at the end of the World War; and

Whereas it is desirable to keep alive in the hearts of the American people the memory of that joyous day; and

Whereas the pursuit of routine labor and business is inconsistent with the proper contemplation of the significance of that day: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved That the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to declare the 11th day of November a national holiday; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that the Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Senate joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and Congress to enact legislation relative to the conscription of wealth and industry in wartime and the effective barring of war profits

Whereas it is the duty of the United States Government to protect the welfare of its people by doing every reasonable thing to avert war; and

Whereas the United States could, to a great extent, accomplish her part in the world's striving for peace by legislating against war profits: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectively urged to enact legislation that will provide for the conscription of wealth and industry used for war purposes upon a basis similar to that for the conscription of man power, and will effectively bar war profits from the use of property or wealth for war purposes; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate joint resolution relative to memorializing the President of the United States and the Members of Congress to extend the life of the Federal Public Works Administration for a period of 2 years after next June 30, and further memorializing Congress to earmark the sum of $350,000,000 of the pending Federal relief appropriation for a continuance of loans and grants under P. W. A. to local communities

Whereas under existing law the life of the Federal Public Works Administration will expire by limitation on June 30, 1937; and

Whereas there has been achieved a remarkable record of accomplishment by this Federal agency in providing useful employment and the construction of needed and permanently useful public works in the form of school buildings, sewage-disposal plants, municipal utilities, and other forms of public projects in every community and to the extent of many thousand in number of such projects; and

Whereas, under the plan of local financial cooperation of the Federal Public Works Administration of loans and grants, hundreds of local communities in the State of California have proceeded in good faith with the voting of bonds, levying of special taxes, and other advance expenditures and commitments in anticipation of loans or grants of Federal P. W. A. funds; and

Whereas all these local communities will be deprived of these public works unless there is a continuance of P. W. A.; and

Whereas the record of performances of P. W. A. has demonstrated that it is the most successful and desirable of the Federal Public Works program in providing maximum relief employment both on the site of the work and in the mills, factories, and sources of production, the survey of the Federal Department of Labor showing that for every person directly employed, three more persons were engaged in producing materials and supplies; and

Whereas it is now thoroughly proven that the prosperity of the Nation depends upon the stimulation of the normal channels of business and trade, thereby increasing private employment in the heavy goods and construction industries rather than in any form of temporary direct relief; and

Whereas the most desirable form of relief is to keep our employables off relief rather than to take them off after they are on; and

Whereas the plan heretofore in effect in P. W. A. of allowing a grant of Federal funds up to a maximum of 45 percent has proven the most feasible, desirable, and practical of all plans in that it means the local community also bears its share of the load; and

Whereas the payment of prevailing wages as against a dole, and the pride and contentment of the worker engaged in useful work adds to the prosperity and comfort of the community as well as to its actual development as a part of our great State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully petition the President of the United States and the Members of the Congress to extend and continue the existence of the Federal Public Works Administration for an additional 2 years after June 30, 1937; and be it further

Resolved, That the sum of not less than $350,000,000 of the $1,500,000,000 carried in the pending Federal relief bill be specifically set aside and earmarked for the continuance of P. W. A. loans and grants on the percentage-of-cost basis which has proven so successful in the past; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge this legislation include a specific provision that artisans and workers may be employed through organized labor and local and Federal employment services without the necessity of first declaring themselves as indigents or relief clients; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge that the proven plan of grants on a percentage of cost ranging from a minimum of 30 percent to a maximum of 45 percent be also incorporated therein; and be it further

Resolved, That we respectfully urge the Congress to take prompt action thereon to the end that the many pending projects already approved and on which plans are fully prepared and all preliminary work fully completed may be placed under construction as quickly as possible; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House, to the members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, to the members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in the Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the City of Chelsea, Mass., protesting against the laying off by the Federal Government of a certain percentage of W. P. A. workers, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the City of Chelsea, Mass., favoring the abrogation of reciprocity treaties permitting the importation of shoes of foreign manufacture into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Thirty-ninth Annual Encampment, Department of the District of Columbia, United Spanish War Veterans, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation reducing the age limit under which Spanish War veterans may receive increased pensions, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Revere Post, No. 61, American Legion, of Revere, Mass., favoring the prompt enactment of special legislation to provide a lifetime annuity for the benefit of Marie Antoinette Connery, widow of Hon. William P. Connery, Jr., late a Representative of the State of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the chairman of the national advisory committee, eighteenth annual convention of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, Denver, Colo., endorsing in behalf of the convention the enactment of the bill (S. 2) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Daniel M. Zimmermann, supervisor of Saluda County and president of the South Carolina Association of County Road Officials, Chappell, S. C., praying that all W. P. A. work sponsors contribute at least one-third of W. P. A. project costs, that county supervisors be allowed complete authority to supervise W. P. A. road projects in their respective counties, and to discharge any W. P. A. employee whose work is unsatisfactory, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Labette County Bankers Association, Parsons, Kans., protesting against the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of branch banks within the various Federal Reserve districts, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Local Union No. 10, Amalgamated Ladies' Garment Cutters' Union, of New York City, favoring the prompt enactment of the pending low-cost housing bill, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, endorsing the basic features of the so-called Wagner-Steagall low-cost housing bill, and favoring the prompt enactment thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by members of the directing committee of the Mount Vernon (N. Y.) Peace Council and the district leaders and block workers of that council, in joint meeting assembled, favoring the prompt enactment of pending legislation to stop the sale of arms to foreign countries in peacetime and to control or prohibit the export of scrap products and pig iron except as licensed by the Secretary of Commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by the Massachusetts State Planning Board, endorsing in principle the so-called Wagner-Steagall low-cost housing bill, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a letter from Henry R. Shepley, president of the Boston Society of Architects, embodying a resolution adopted by the Sixty-ninth Convention of the American Institute of Architects held at Boston, Mass., endorsing the basic features of the so-called Wagner-Steagall low-cost housing bill and favoring the prompt enactment thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Board of the Board of Aldermen of the City of Chelsea, Mass., favor-the laying off by the Federal Government of a certain percentage of W. P. A. workers, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the City of Chelsea, Mass., favoring the abrogation of reciprocity treaties permitting the importation of shoes of foreign manufacture into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Massachusetts Bar Association, endorsing the adverse report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on the reorganization of the Federal judiciary, and protesting against the enactment of the bill (S. 1392) to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table.

A bill (S. 2690) to amend the military record of John C. Graham, Jr., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2691) granting the consent of the United States to the exercise of the power of eminent domain with respect to certain Indian lands in Graham County, N. C.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2692) to provide funds for the initiation of a mapping program in the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. NYE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) authorizing and directing the Comptroller General of the United States to certify for payment certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920 as per a certain contract authorized by the President; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 7206. An act to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts Silver Jubilee Camp to be held in the United States in 1937; to the Committee on Immigration.

H. R. 7472. An act to provide additional revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. J. Res. 415. Joint resolution making an appropriation to defray expenses incident to the dedication of chapels and other World War memorials erected in Europe, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion by Mr. TRUMAN, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2571) to incorporate The Bible Foundation, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN TAXES—AMENDMENT

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 375) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EVA MARKOWITZ

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 458) for the relief of Eva Markowitz, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. ELLENDER, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

JOSEPH M. CLAGETT, JR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 730) for the relief of Joseph M. Clagett, Jr., and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

WALTER T. KARSHNER ET AL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1377) conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of Walter T. Karshner, Katherine Karshner, Anne M. Karshner, and Mrs. James E. McShane, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. BROWN of Michigan, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

VENICE LA PRAD

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1945) for the relief of Venice La Prad, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. ELLENDER, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

NOAH SPOONER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3634) for the relief of Noah Spooner, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. ELLENDER, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

CLAIMS FOR EXCESS COSTS ON MISSISSIPPI DAMS AND LOCKS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2565) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and enter judgment upon the claims of contractors for excess costs incurred while constructing navigation dams and locks on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. BROWN of Michigan, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM SULEM

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2332) for the relief of William Sulem, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

MR. AND MRS. DAVID STOPPEL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2562) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. David Stoppel, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE ALIEN IN AMERICA—ADDRESS BY SENATOR REYNOLDS

ADDRESS OF COMPTROLLER OF CURRENCY BEFORE WASHINGTON STATE BANKERS' ASSOCIATION

[Mr. SCHWELLENBACH asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Hon. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, at the annual convention of the Washington Bankers' Association, at Bellingham, Wash., on June 17, instant, which appears in the Appendix.]

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS—STATEMENT OF SIDNEY HILLMAN

[Mr. BLACK asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement of Sidney Hillman on June 15, 1937, before the joint session of the Committee on Labor of the Senate and House of Representatives with regard to the bill for the establishment of fair labor standards, which appears in the Appendix.]

RELIEF APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) making appropriations for relief purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment of Mr. ROBINSON to the amendment of the committee is, on page 4, line 17, to strike out "40" and insert in lieu thereof "25"; after the word "services", in line 18, page 4, to insert a period and strike out the remainder of the amendment down to and including the word "supply", in line 23, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That if the President shall find any project to be necessary in order to provide work relief in the community where the project is to be located, and that the applicant is unable to supply 25 percent of the cost as herein required, he may authorize the project upon such contribution or assurance of contribution as he finds that the applicant is able to make.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee, I have a short statement that I wish to make.

Mr. President, whatever may have been our former notions, no one now disputes that unemployment relief is a national question as well as a State and local question, and the Federal Government has a duty to perform in regard to it.

Work and work relief must go to those individuals who are without work and who need relief, regardless of where they live in the Nation and, therefore, any arbitrary plan which would afford such relief to the wealthier States and the wealthier communities and deny it to the poorer States and the poorer communities would defeat the purpose of national work relief.

The requirement as to 25 percent sponsoring contributions would permit only those States and communities which put up the 25 percent to receive Federal work relief, regardless of how many persons in nonsponsoring States need work relief. This would not be fair or just or equitable.

From the evidence before the committee, it is perfectly clear that many States and cities will be unable to put up the 25 percent required by this amendment. Therefore, this arbitrary requirement for such sponsors, contribution will prevent such States and cities from obtaining Federal work relief. In like manner, if this amendment should be adopted, it would provide the needy in the rich cities with work-relief aid, while largely denying the needy in the poorer cities and poorer States all work relief. It would make the national work-relief plan a one-sided, lopsided affair. It would be partial legislation, if not class legislation.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], however, says his amendment will give the President full power to alter and ignore the 25-percent sponsorship requirement. If he is correct in this, why adopt the amendment? The whole subject of the work relief is and has been in the President's hands all the time. Then, why hamper and hamstring him at this late date? It is admitted that the President does not want this amendment; that he thinks it will hamper him in the administration of relief to the best interests of those who need work relief. It is admitted that time and effort and expense will be required to put the program in force. Why place this additional burden on the President? Why place this additional hardship on him? If the amendment takes away no power from the President, as has been stated, why enact it? Why enact a meaningless amendment?

It is admitted that the amendment will change the plan of work relief as it now exists and as it has existed from the beginning of Federal work relief. We all admit that work relief is a national question, we all admit that it has been of great aid to those who were without employment and without hope of getting employment, and that it has greatly aided in restoring better conditions to our country.

Mr. President, we Democrats, I think, practically without exception, in the campaign last fall boasted about the President's administration of work relief. That was one of the issues on which the Democratic Party was returned to power. We all boasted that the President had done a masterly job in work relief. What has happened to change our minds at this late date? What has the President done to make us now have less faith in him in the administration of work relief? What has Mr. Hopkins done in 1937, in his management of work relief, that he did not do in 1936?

Mr. President, the President and Mr. Hopkins, in my opinion, have done a splendid job. Mr. Hopkins and his assistants are experts in work relief. What Member of the Senate feels that he knows more about work relief than do the President and Mr. Hopkins, who have had it in hand all these months and years? Why change an admittedly successful plan for one that no one has tried out? Why should we not continue to create work for the needy unemployed along lines which have been tried and found good?

We have greatly reduced the appropriation for work relief. Our largest appropriation was $4,800,000,000. That was greatly reduced the next year, and the next year, and this year, including the unexpended balances, the appropriation will not be over $1,700,000,000. We are reducing relief expenditures steadily and tremendously every year. Why not let the President make the best use of the funds appropriated by Congress in the same manner that we have been doing?

But it is claimed that under the present system the New York needy get more than do the North Carolina needy. The testimony before the committee is both ways. It is difficult to say which is correct. The funds have not been distributed with absolute equality. Idaho gave the highest sponsoring fund, 28.3 percent; Wyoming came next with 26.7 percent; Tennessee was third with 26.6 percent. North Carolina gave as a sponsoring fund 18.8 percent. I am not complaining because my State contributed a larger proportion than did North Carolina or New York or South Carolina. I think the needy have been taken care of in proportion to their needs, and that is the purpose of the law.

But it is claimed that the Budget must be balanced and at once. Mr. President, no one in the Senate wants to see the Budget balanced more than do I, and I want to see it balanced at the earliest possible moment; but I do not want to balance it at the expense of the needy unemployed of the country.

Mr. President, the Budget can be easily balanced. The President, in the newspapers of this morning, has pointed out one way, and that is to require the heads of the departments to cut down their expenditures. It can be balanced by July 1938 by giving the President power to reduce any and all expenditures 10 percent in all cases where he deems it wise to do so. It can be balanced by cutting down appropriations for war purposes, for the building of larger and larger armies. It can be balanced by cutting down the subsidies we are paying to the suppliant rich for the building of larger vessels. It can be balanced by cutting down the many other subsidies we are paying the rich organizations of this country.

It can be balanced by stopping in the various departments the expensive investigations and studies that are being made and are of very little value to the American people. There are a hundred ways of balancing the Budget if we have the courage to do it. But for one, Mr. President, I am unwilling to cast my vote to balance that Budget by taking away work relief from the needy unemployed. It is through no fault of theirs that they are unemployed; it was through no fault of theirs that they were deprived of work; and I am unalterably opposed to singling out the most unfortunate, the poorest, the most needy class of all our citizens and requiring them to bear the burden of balancing the Budget.

I believe that the abolition of the rich subsidies that we are paying to people who need no subsidies should be the first step to be taken in cutting down expenditures. I believe we should reduce our expenditures for war purposes rather than take away work relief from the suffering unemployed of our land.

Yes, we can balance the Budget by next January if we defeat this bill entirely. Let the poor and unemployed then go hungry and starve if it is wished to do so, but vote against the whole bill if that is the purpose. Do not vote to strangle the bill, to strangle the entire enterprise, by an amendment which, in my opinion, is unfair and unjust and impossible of fulfillment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the immediate question before the Senate is that of providing a sufficient appropriation to take care of the unemployed and the needy during the coming year. That is the practical problem. In my opinion, the Congress has no very wide discretion in regard to the matter. It is our duty to ascertain, as nearly as we may, the actual amount necessary to take care of the unemployed, and then to provide that amount.

There are some places and in some matters where undoubtedly we can and should cut down expenditures, but the only place where we can have any effect in saving taxes in connection with the pending joint resolution is in the manner of expending the fund. There can be, in my opinion, greater economy in the expenditure of this fund. I do not think that economy in expenditure has been the outstanding characteristic of the administration of this fund, but it has not all been the fault of Mr. Hopkins by any means. Governors and mayors and Members of Congress and everyone seemed willing to call for more and more, and not always measured by the matter of unemployment in their respective places. Nevertheless we have a certain amount of unemployed in the country and we want to take care of them, and we intend to do so. The only question is how we can provide for their relief with as little expenditure as possible in the way of administering the fund.

The Robinson and Byrnes amendments were designed, in my opinion, to urge economy upon the part of the administrators of the fund. Whether they will accomplish that object or not I do not know. It is a little difficult to say. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] provides that those in the States shall contribute 25 percent where they are able to do so. An arbitrary amount would undoubtedly work a hardship, because, as said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], it would withhold help from those who might need it most.

However, the Senator from Arkansas has provided in his amendment that where the necessity is made to appear that the applicants be taken care of and that they are unable to contribute, the President may release the effect of the law, as it would then be if the joint resolution is passed. Of course, when we speak of the President we necessarily mean Mr. Hopkins, because he would administer the fund. The effect of the amendment would be to provide that those who are able to do so should contribute 25 percent and those who are not able to do so may be exempted from the operation of the law by the action of Mr. Hopkins. It is undoubtedly the hope of the authors that it will work some economy in administering the fund. It is not designed to take from the unemployed, but rather to help in making the administration less expensive. It may do so. It is worth the effort, it seems to me.

The only question with reference to the amendment, so far as I am concerned, is whether it would change the program in any respect whatever. If it would meet the objective which the authors have in mind it would undoubtedly be helpful, but if Mr. Hopkins will be the person who will pass upon it, will it change the real program of the administration of the fund in any respect whatever? I should have liked to have the view of some of those who have been in the habit of administering this fund, or were near to it, as to how it would aid in the economy of expenditure of the fund, because that is its real merit if it has any. I am hoping it will be of some value.

Mr. President, whether it has any effect on the pending measure or not, the statement of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] last Friday with reference to the question of expenditures needed to be made. I observed the other day, from a high authority who is supposed to know, that in 1850 we took 1 cent out of every income dollar for taxes, local, State, and National; that in 1890 we took 5 cents out of every income dollar; that in 1914 we took 16 cents; and in 1936 we took 35 cents out of every income dollar for taxes.

Over these long years, including war and emergency, including peacetime and prosperity, there has been a constant growth of expenditure and a constant increase of the tax burden. We have reached the point, as indicated by the Senator from Arkansas, where this creeping paralysis is reaching near the heart. There must be a reduction because we have not only reached the huge sum which we are now expending, but we have reached the point practically where we are face to face with diminishing tax returns from the taxpayers.

Not much has been said and very little debate has taken place on the great change which has occurred in recent months with reference to the taxing power in the United States. The responsibility now, under the decision of the Supreme Court, is entirely or almost entirely with Congress. The Court has said, and by the unanimous support of all parties and all divisions of the Government, that the Congress may now lay taxes, impose duties and excises, to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the country. It has further said that the discretion as to what is the general welfare is practically in the hands of Congress.

We have not as yet felt the effect of that policy; but to have established as the policy of this Government, by the consent of all departments of the Government and by the consent of all political parties, that the Congress may lay taxes to take care of anything that Congress regards as the general welfare, constitutes the most serious change in the economic situation of this country of which I can conceive. The unlimited power to tax the people is the unlimited power to bring about economic destitution.

Mr. President, let me read what Mr. Justice Cardozo said on this subject:

> Congress may spend money in aid of the "general welfare." There have been great statesmen in our history who have stood for other views. We will not resurrect the contest. It is now settled by decision. The conception of the spending power advocated by Hamilton and strongly reinforced by Story has prevailed over that of Madison, which has not been lacking in adherents. Yet difficulties are left when the power is conceded. The line must still be drawn between one welfare and another, between particular and general. Where this shall be placed cannot be known through a formula in advance of the event. There is a middle ground or certainly a penumbra in which discretion is at large. The discretion, however, is not confided to the courts. The discretion belongs to Congress, unless the choice is clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power.

What limitation is there upon the power of Congress to lay taxes and expend money? As a practical question, where is there any limitation? Under that rule, as Hamilton contended, Congress is practically the judge of what constitutes the general welfare. Unless it is unmistakably shown to be arbitrary or capricious, the judgment of Congress prevails.

Of late there has been much contention in this country that Congress should be without restraint; that it represents the people, and therefore that it should not be restricted by other departments of the Government. Now Congress has the entire power on taxes and expenditures.

We are the sole guardian of the taxpayers of the United States, as a practical proposition. We can either make or ruin the great masses of the people of the United States by our expenditures. When the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] spoke, I thought he must have been speaking in the wake of this tremendous power which has now been assured to the Congress of the United States. As this power fattens by what it feeds upon it will have its effect upon the whole people. Only the utmost vigilance upon the part of voters and the utmost self-restraint in Congress will prevent incalculable burdens being placed upon the taxpayers.

It will be recalled that when the Constitutional Convention was in session at Philadelphia, Mr. Hamilton, as one of the delegates from New York, attended and made his proposal as to the form of government which we should adopt. Among other things, he proposed that the President should hold office for life, and that the Members of the Senate should hold office for life or during good behavior; and these are generally regarded as the distinguishing characteristics of the Hamilton plan. As a matter of fact, however, the distinguishing feature of the Hamilton plan was that the Congress should have power to enact all laws whatsoever, subject to certain minor negations. That was the distinguishing feature of the Hamilton plan, especially as it applies to our conditions today.

The Hamilton plan received little approval. Hamilton therefore returned to New York either disgruntled or discouraged, and took little part in the Convention thereafter. But 6 days before the Convention adjourned this clause, the first clause of section 8 of article I, was inserted in the Constitution, providing that Congress should have power to lay and collect taxes to provide for the general welfare. Whether it was a coincidence or whether the genius of Hamilton saw that his principle had been practically adopted, he returned to the Convention and became, with the possible exception of Madison, the most earnest and enthusiastic advocate of the adoption of the Constitution. When the Constitution was adopted and Hamilton was made Secretary of the Treasury, he did not wait long to place his construction upon the general-welfare clause. It was to the effect that Congress had the power, in its own discretion, to levy taxes and make expenditures for any purpose which Congress thought came within the general-welfare clause.

One hundred and forty-seven years after the Report on Manufacturers was written, the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously, upon the urging of the successor of Madison in administration, adopted the Hamiltonian view. We now have in this country, so far as the economic welfare of the country is concerned, so far as the interests of the taxpayer are concerned, a Congress with practically unlimited power. If the brakes are not put on here, there is no place where they can be put on.

We now have a debt of $36,000,000,000. The States and the counties and the cities have a debt of some $25,000,000,000. For what we shall do in the future with reference to taxes and debts the responsibility is here, upon this Congress and the ones which shall succeed it.

Let us not forget that after all is said and done, and after all the talk that we indulge in about taxes in high brackets and about gift taxes, the great burden of taxation in this country falls upon the masses. Analyze the gift taxes, analyze the income taxes in the higher brackets, set the two sums down beside the other taxes which are passed on and on and on, most of them until they reach the man who cannot pass them on, and we find that the burden falls upon the great mass of the people of this country.

It is sometimes said that we ought to create a tax consciousness among the people, and that if that were done they would be more desirous of economy. Tax consciousness? Is there a man or a woman outside of the insane asylum or the penitentiary who is not tax conscious in the United States today? Are they not conscious of the fact that they are paying heavy taxes, if not in this one way, then in another way; if not in rent, if not by the increased price of their goods, if not by having them passed on, then in some other way? We never can get sufficient taxes in this country from any source to relieve the common people greatly of the unfair burden which falls upon them in the matter of taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. He has 20 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had about concluded what I had to say.

I suggested in the opening that our immediate problem is to provide for the unemployed and that we have not a very wide discretion in regard to the matter; for the condition in which the country now is, and will be for some time, would make it highly unsafe for anything in the nature of hunger riots to start in this country. We have not, therefore, any considerable discretion to exercise in this matter; but we have discretion with reference to a multitude of things which are coming before us, and which will continue to come before us in time to come. My purpose today was to say that the responsibility is upon the Congress of the United States. As a practical matter we are now the sole guardians of the interests of the taxpayers of the United States. If we fully realize our power, certainly we must realize our stupendous responsibility. The greatest menace to the capitalistic system, the greatest threat to the economic health and welfare of the people is the power of taxation. The responsibility cannot be evaded; and the consequences, whatever they may be, will be the fruits of our action and that of succeeding Congresses.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hesitate to detain the Senate even for a moment; but there are one or two things which I wish to say in connection with the pending amendment and one or two things which I think we ought to keep in mind before we vote upon it.

I am extremely sorry to find myself in disagreement on this matter with my good friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and my good friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]; but in matters of this sort, where we have deep convictions, the only guide we have is our own individual consciences, and unless we follow that light I suppose we shall fail in our duty.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] the other day read from two or three speeches made by the President in 1932 when he was Governor of New York, while he was a candidate for the high office which he now holds, in which he stressed the fact that relief was primarily a local matter. We all entertained those views in 1932; but the world has learned a great deal since 1932; the President of the United States has learned a great deal; the Senate of the United States has learned a great deal in the past 5 years. We learned soon after 1932 that relief could not be regarded strictly as a local matter, because there was not a community in the United States, there was not a local government in the United States that was responsible for the conditions which made relief necessary.

Years ago I was a county officer in the State of Kentucky. I was the executive head of the government of the county in which I lived, and in which I still live. We levied a tax which we called the "poor fund tax", by reason of which we created a poor fund for the support of the aged and the indigent, and that fund was inviolable; it could not be expended for any other purpose except to support the poor. Many a winter's day did I spend the entire day writing orders for groceries and clothing and for shelter for those who were unable, by reason of age or by reason of disease, to support themselves. But no one ever contemplated that a great disaster, for which that county was not responsible, that a great national debacle such as we have been going through for the last 5 or 6 years, would make it necessary or make that county able to care for the overwhelming number of those who were unable to care for themselves because of this national depression. That was only typical of every county and city and local community in the United States. While counties and cities and local districts attempted to look after their normal poor and unemployed, neither their financial nor their budgetary arrangements nor their powers were geared to contend with such a condition as we have witnessed in this country for the last 7 years.

Even after the present administration came into power we entertained the delusion that, after all, relief was local. We started out by undertaking to lend money to the States. We deluded ourselves with the belief that it would be repaid, although many of the States and their executive authorities had no constitutional power to borrow money from the Federal Government or from any other source. We soon got away from that delusion, and we accepted relief as a national responsibility, just as we accepted flood control in the Mississippi Valley as a national responsibility, because the waters of 31 States poured down into the Mississippi Valley and we recognized that not a State or a city or a county in that great valley could protect itself against the waters of 31 States.

We soon began to realize the fact that no county or city in the United States could protect itself against the great flood of unemployment, which was brought upon our country without the responsibility of a single mayor, or a single city council, or a single city manager, or a single governor, or school district anywhere in the United States of America. There is not a mayor of any city or council in any city or a city manager or a governor who was responsible, by reason of laws enacted, or through any executive policy that was inaugurated, for the Nation-wide depression which has so devastated the ranks of employment in the United States.

If it be true, therefore, that our cities and our counties and our States may go acquit of any responsibility for this national depression or this national catastrophe, are we ready now to throw back upon these local communities responsibility for caring for those millions of people who have suffered because of this national disaster?

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. May I further call the Senator's attention to the fact that in a great many of these cities which have taken care of their poor there has been an influx of unemployed, until the burden has been so increased that it is far beyond the normal number they would have to take care of; and it would be a burden to ask those local communities, which have been fair to the unemployed and have attracted unemployed who do not necessarily belong to them within their borders, to take care of that increased population not their own?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is absolutely correct. I recall that a few years ago in the great city of Chicago, the second city in the United States, one of the great progressive and beautiful cities of the United States and of the world, as I have walked along Michigan Boulevard and have seen the indirect lighting that was playing upon the skyline of that great city, it presented a picture of fairyland. Yet 3 or 4 years ago that city, without any responsibility for it, was unable to pay its school teachers, not because of any act of the mayor of that city, not because of any shortcoming on the part of the city council, but because either of world conditions or because of the policy of folly inaugurated by our National Government, the city of Chicago was unable to collect the taxes which it levied upon its own people in order to conduct its own government.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. Does the Senator have any objection to local communities which are able paying 25 percent of the cost of their work relief?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. BURKE. Then what objection is there to Congress setting up this standard, and saying, "We think that if you are able you ought to pay 25 percent; if you are not able, you do not have to pay anything"?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not required to answer the Senator categorically. I intend to discuss that question in its various ramifications in a moment.

Mr. BURKE. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. One objection now is that there are many communities which pay more under the present arrangement, but whenever we set the standard at 25 percent there will not be a community in the United States which will not seek to reduce its contribution to 25 percent, although it might be able to pay 30 or 40 or 50 percent. Under the present arrangement, where they sit down around a table and confer informally, I happen to know that some communities are paying 50 percent. In my own State I have participated in services dedicating great public buildings, where the local community contributed 40 percent of the cost of the building, and the Federal Government 60 percent. But if there had been a requirement, or a standard, or a yardstick, of 25 percent, enacted by Congress, is it to be supposed that the community to which I have referred would have been satisfied to put up 40 percent? They would have tried to reduce their contribution to 25 percent, whereas they were willing, under the present plan, to put up 40 percent.

Not only that, but whenever 25 percent is set as the standard, and the President, under the authority given him here, reduces it in any community to 20, or 15, or 10, there will be a cry and combined pressure from every other community in the United States to induce him to reduce their contribution to 20, or 15, or 10, or 5, notwithstanding the fact that they might be able to contribute 25 percent, or even 50 percent. The President will thus become involved in the pulling and hauling between communities to determine their legal and financial ability to contribute at least 25 percent of any project before they can share in this appropriation.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one more question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield, but my time is limited, and I have some things I desire to say.

Mr. BURKE. If we set up this 25-percent limit, then, the Senator says, we may discourage some communities which are contributing larger percentages. Does the Senator have any figures to show what percentage of communities contributed over 25 percent last year?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I have not those figures.

Mr. BURKE. I think that if the Senator will examine the figures he will find it was a mere bagatelle, amounting to nothing.

Mr. BARKLEY. When we find that the average throughout the United States for last year was 13 percent, and now amounts to over 16, we must concede that there must have been a good many paying more than 25 in order to make the average 16.

Mr. President, for the last year we have been throwing back upon the local communities what we call direct relief, and when we threw that burden back upon the communities we threw back more than they had borne in normal times. We threw back more upon them than they had borne prior to 1929. We threw twice as much back upon them as they had ever borne before, and in many communities we threw three times as much back as they had ever borne before.

We entered into a sort of gentlemen's agreement between the Federal Government and the States and communities that if they would take care of direct relief and feed and clothe and shelter the unemployables, the United States Government, through the work-relief program, would take care of those capable of employment, and I contend that the States and local communities have carried out their part of that understanding with generosity and in good faith.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have not been in the Chamber throughout the debate. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. To what agreement does the Senator refer? I did not know there was any agreement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said it was an informal understanding that the Federal Government would withdraw from direct relief; and that was done. The Relief Administration has not been administering direct relief for the past year. We threw that back on the local communities. For the past year we have only been carrying out works projects, administration projects, by employing people who were employable and requesting the States and cities and counties and local communities to feed and clothe and house those who were incapable of employment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the amendment is about to expire.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will proceed with my 20 minutes on the bill.

In order to prove that the States and the local communities have done their share under this arrangement, I desire to put into the RECORD a few figures showing what the States have done in the last 4 years, and particularly during the last year, since this understanding was entered into.

In 1933 the State of Alabama and all its subdivisions contributed $709,000 for local relief. In 1936 Alabama contributed over $10,000,000 to local relief.

In 1933 Arizona contributed $734,000 for local relief. In 1936 Arizona contributed five and one-half million dollars.

In 1933 Arkansas contributed $322,000 for local relief, while in 1936 it contributed over $8,000,000.

In 1933 California contributed $22,000,000, and in 1936 contributed $80,000,000—an increase of nearly 400 percent.

The State of Delaware is one of two or three States that decreased its contributions in 1936 below what they were in 1933.

Florida in 1933 contributed $1,000,000 for local relief, while in 1936 Florida contributed over $9,000,000.

In 1933 Georgia contributed $743,000, and in 1936 over $10,000,000 for local relief.

Idaho contributed in 1933 for local relief $669,000. In 1936 Idaho contributed $3,600,000.

In 1933 Illinois contributed $19,000,000 to local relief. In 1936 Illinois gave $110,000,000 out of the pockets of her people to feed and clothe and house needy people in Illinois.

Indiana in 1933 gave $7,000,000 for local relief; in 1935 it gave $15,000,000, but in 1936 it gave $27,000,000.

The State of Michigan in 1933 contributed $10,000,000, and in 1936 contributed $48,000,000 for local relief.

In 1933 Massachusetts gave $34,000,000 to local relief, and in 1936 contributed $48,000,000.

Minnesota in 1933 gave $5,000,000, but in 1936 gave $26,000,000 for local relief.

Missouri gave $3,000,000 in 1933, and in 1936 gave $29,000,000.

Nebraska in 1933 gave $2,150,000, but last year Nebraska contributed locally more than $16,000,000 to help feed and clothe and house her unemployed.

In 1933 the State of New Jersey contributed $20,000,000 but last year New Jersey gave $36,000,000.

In 1933 New York contributed $84,000,000 to feed and clothe and house the unemployed, but last year New York gave $282,000,000 for local relief.

The State of Ohio in 1933 gave $18,000,000 for local relief. In 1936 Ohio gave $64,000,000. Ohio increased her contribution from $20,000,000 in 1935 to $64,000,000 in 1936.

The State of Oklahoma gave $2,000,000 in 1933 and $15,000,000 in 1936.

Pennsylvania gave in 1933 $40,000,000. In 1936 Pennsylvania gave $107,000,000 for local relief.

Rhode Island in 1933 gave $2,000,000 for local relief. In 1936 she gave $11,000,000.

Tennessee gave $429,000 in 1933, but in 1936 gave $16,000,000 for local relief.

In 1933 the State of Texas contributed locally $1,140,000, but in 1936 gave $43,000,000 for local relief.

The State of Wisconsin gave $8,000,000 in 1933, $28,000,000 in 1936.

So, Mr. President, these figures show that already the States and counties and cities are doing their share to bear this load. Already they are carrying infinitely more of it than they carried in 1929, or 1931, or 1932, or 1933. They are carrying more than twice as much of it as they carried in 1935, and now, when we may be making the final appropriation by the Congress of the United States for work relief, we are asked to set up a standard of 25 percent contribution for every community in the United States.

Mr. President, when we gave the President $3,300,000,000 we did not set any such standard as that. We were willing to trust him then. When we gave him $4,800,000,000 we did not require that he assess every local community 25 percent. When we gave him $2,500,000,000 we did not set up any such yardstick as this. When in January or February of this year we gave him an additional $789,000,000 for the remainder of this fiscal year we did not say, "You must require 25-percent local contribution unless, by converting yourself into a Moody's Manual, you find that these communities cannot contribute that amount of money."

We have given the President more than $10,000,000,000 with which to relieve unemployment and relieve suffering in the United States. Has any of it been wasted? I dare say some of it has. You cannot build a smokehouse, you cannot build a sidewalk or a highway or a street, you cannot build a cottage in your own home town to house and shelter your own family without taking the chance that somewhere down the line some dollar will stick to fingers that do not deserve it. But I am not afraid to make the statement that no government in all the history of mankind ever expended $10,000,000,000 to relieve human suffering where there was so little waste or graft as has been experienced in the expenditure of the $10,000,000,000 we have given out of the Treasury of the United States to relieve suffering and to start the wheels of industry and start our Nation upon the road back to the crest of prosperity and happiness for 130,000,000 people during the past 4 years.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator will recall some discussion on the floor last Friday about tax delinquencies. I will ask the Senator if that could occur under the Kentucky statute? In a newspaper I received this morning from my own State there is contained a story pointing out that tax delinquency in King County, which is the richest county in the State, on the first day of 1937 stood at more than eleven and one-half million dollars. The total tax delinquency in the State of Washington at that time was $37,157,476. If the State of Washington, which is a small State, not thickly populated, had over $37,000,000 of defaulted taxes, I do not think they can do a whole lot toward carrying this burden. But the people out there, simply through poverty, have been unable to pay their taxes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is correct, and that is a picture of conditions which exist in many sections of the United States. We all realize that we have turned up the hill of prosperity. Our annual income as a Nation descended from over $80,000,000,000 in 1929 to about $47,000,000,000 at the depth of the depression in 1932. We have turned up the hill, and last year our annual income was over $62,000,000,000, and it is estimated that the annual income for 1937 will be $70,000,000,000. But, Mr. President, there are more than 7,000,000 unemployed men in the United States, and if each one of them represents a family of four there are nearly 30,000,000 people in this Nation of ours to whom so far that increase in income means nothing.

Mr. President, we were willing to trust the President with over $10,000,000,000, but now that we are marching up the hill, though we have not yet reached the crest, now that we are on our way because the policies that he inaugurated have led us out of the depression and out of the valley of tears, now that we are marching toward the top we are asked to hobble him, handcuff him, and put a ring in his nose in the expenditure of a billion and a half dollars, which is a paltry sum compared to the more than $10,000,000,000 we have entrusted to him within the last 4 years.

Having trusted him to spend over $10,000,000,000, I am going to trust him to spend a billion and a half dollars, or I am going to vote not to give it to him at all. Having trusted him thus far, if I am not willing to trust him with another billion and a half dollars I ought to be consistent and take it away from him.

We are told that he can obviate the proposed 25-percent requirement by finding that any community is unable to make the contribution and that, therefore, it does not make any difference whether this amendment is adopted. Well, if it makes no difference, why offer it; why inject it in here if the President can avoid it by ignoring it? It was not injected here for that purpose, Mr. President.

The first effort was to reduce all appropriations 10 percent after the President sent his message here asking us to observe some rules of economy and in the same message saying that he needed a minimum of a billion and a half dollars for next year for relief. Of course, the effort was abortive. Then it was substituted by an effort to reduce the billion-and-a-half-dollar appropriation to $1,000,000,000, which also proved abortive; and now the 40-percent requirement was introduced as a substitute for the reduction of a half billion dollars. There is no use to deny that. When it was found impossible to reduce the minimum that the President requested from a billion and a half dollars to $1,000,000,000, the 40-percent requirement was injected here in the hope, as the author of the proposal suggested and admitted, that it might reduce the Federal contribution to at least a billion dollars if not to $750,000,000; and when it was found that the 40 percent would not prevail the proposal is whittled down to 25 percent; and it is all with the hope that the United States Government may load still more of this burden upon every town and school district in the United States.

Mr. President, I am as anxious as is any other man on this floor to balance our Budget, and I regret as much as any Member of this body that we ever had to assume the obligation of feeding the hungry; that we ever had to reach the arm of the United States out into the States, the counties, and the cities in order to feed and clothe and house the needy. I regret that it ever became necessary for us to embark in that field, and I will welcome as cordially as will any other Senator our withdrawal from that field at as early a date as may be possible. But, Mr. President, I hope that the floor of the United States Senate is not to be converted into a theater where shall be reenacted the scenes of the Merchant of Venice with Uncle Sam playing the role of Shylock and demanding his pound of flesh from every school district and every city hall and every courthouse and every home in the United States of America.

This is a national problem. It was made so not by the act of any county, city, town, or school district; and, while it may be that in the expenditure of this enormous sum, a few dollars have stuck to fingers that did not deserve them, on the whole, it has been possible through the expenditure of this money to renew the faith of our people in the Government of the United States. They have learned that our Nation and our Government and our politics are not institutions inaugurated in order that men may run for office and draw salaries, and that taxes may be levied in order that officeholders may draw their salaries; but that our Government is the agency and instrumentality of the people to guide and lead them in the solution of their problems.

I am thankful to God Almighty that in this great crisis our Nation has led our people out of the wilderness and that we have a leader who is sufficiently venturesome not to be afraid to plow through new ground in the solution of the difficult economic and social problems that beset our great people.

I hope this amendment, and all other amendments of its type and nature, will be defeated, and that the pending joint resolution will be passed without any such encumbrances upon it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not think we have yet gotten out of the "vale of tears", although it seems to me the Senate has been treated to more lachrymose rhetoric than ever before in the history of the Republic. I individually think that more economic blunders, if not in some instances economic crimes, have been perpetrated by Congress in the name of starving people who never starved and freezing people not one of whom has ever frozen than the imagination can conjure up.

I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee. Preferably, I would vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], not because I believe it is going to make any amazing difference in the amount of money expended but because I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the people are "tax-conscious", and I believe, in some small measure, the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would make the people tax-conscious. I do not believe the Governors of the States or the lobby of the mayors of the various cities are in any degree tax-conscious.

The talk about the cities and communities being unable to pay a certain percentage of the cost they incur for the Nation raises the question as to who is to pay the nearly $40,000,000,000 of indebtedness already incurred—not nearly thirty-six billion, but nearly forty billion, if not over that sum, when we count the contingent indebtedness of the United States. Who is to pay it? Are we to repudiate the national debt, or are we to pay the national debt at maturity and as it matures?

Who constitute the States and the communities of the States? The people of the States and of the communities constitute the States and communities, and every man in every community and every State has not only got to pay the percentage that we are talking about but, in the last analysis, he has got to pay the entire indebtedness of this Nation, together with the accrued interest on that indebtedness.

The suggestion was made here the other day that the greater portion of the revenues of the Government was derived from income taxes. That is far from the truth. The greater portion of the revenues of the Government is derived from miscellaneous taxes upon all the people of the country. If we were to take every dollar that the wealthy classes derive in income, if we were to take their very principal, we could not begin to pay a measurable part of the indebtedness that this Nation has already incurred; and if gentlemen think that this indebtedness is not a menace to the Nation itself, they are very much mistaken.

We boast of the credit of the Government; we see it announced in the newspapers that subscriptions to Treasury issues are tremendously oversubscribed. As a matter of fact, they are not subscriptions at all; they are allocations. The Treasury certificates are allocated to the banks, and the banks are compelled to take the bonds, for they have been maneuvered into a position where they cannot refuse to take future issues because they must protect the enormous amount of Federal securities which they already hold; and a reduction of 10 percent under the par value of Federal securities would practically bankrupt 90 percent of the banks of the country. If we keep on constituting ourselves legislative spendthrifts for the Government, pretty soon such a depreciation in Government securities is going to occur, and when it does occur and when the banks with their millions of depositors and stockholders have to meet that issue, we are going to have precipitated upon us a disaster of which none of us can conceive.

As a matter of fact, we are not tax-minded. In nearly every community in this country public officials are taxing their ingenuity to think of and devise projects, a large proportion of which are of no use on earth. The idea of my community, one of the richest towns in the State of Virginia, whose bonds sell away above par, borrowing money from the Federal Government to construct sewers and sidewalks! I think it is a disgrace to the community, and it is not very creditable to the State of Virginia, whose bonds rank above those of the United States Government, that it should come here and borrow Federal money.

Federal money? Where does the Government get any money that it does not first pick from the pockets of the taxpayers of the various States and subdivisions thereof? That is the only way the Federal Government gets any money, and it is going down deeper and deeper into the pockets of every taxpayer in the communities and in the States in order to meet the maturities of the enormous national debt.

For that reason and others I intend to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Moreover, I never intend so long as I live to vote for lump-sum appropriations to be turned over to minor irresponsible officials, unbonded men, not elected by the people but appointed, to spend fabulous sums. Seven billion dollars are turned over to a man who never had any real business connection in his life to distribute as he may please at his discretion. I have voted against these lump-sum appropriations every time they have been proposed, and I am going to continue to vote against them at this time and whenever they may be projected here. It is an unbusinesslike way to make appropriations, and it results in ruinous extravagance.

Therefore I shall vote for the pending amendment in order to make the people at least somewhat tax-conscious, and in order that they may understand the implications when their Governors and mayors exhaust their ingenuity in the effort to secure projects for the purpose, in some cases, of teaching people art, of teaching them music, of teaching them how to play golf, and a multitude of other silly things, all at the expense of the taxpayers of the country. Talk about people starving! It would be better to take the money and feed the hungry, if there be any, instead of engaging in all of this foolishness.

Mr. President, I feel so intensely that the Congress of the United States is precipitating this country into actual bankruptcy with its extravagance that I am utterly opposed to the whole business and shall vote against it.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the adoption of the pending amendment or any other similar amendment would impose upon the President labors greater than Hercules ever performed, and subject him to afflictions more intolerable than the boils that covered the man of Uz from the top of his head to the soles of his feet.

He would be obliged to become a more efficient and unerring sleuth than Sherlock Homes, and ascertain the financial sufficiency of every State, every county, every city, every town, and every village in the land.

The acquisition of the information contemplated by the amendment would require an army of investigators, inquisitors, and informers as numerous as the combined hosts that followed Xerxes, Alexander, and the old Napoleon.

The cost of accomplishing the purposes of the amendment would be out of all reasonable proportion to the contributions which it seeks to compel the sponsors of projects to make to the cause of relief.

And after all necessary information had been collected, classified, and considered the President would be required to certify that many of the States are irremediable bankrupts, many of our cities are helpless beggars, and many of our towns are hopeless paupers.

A more undesirable or embarrassing relief situation than that which would result from the adoption of the amendment can scarcely be conceived.

A vote for the amendment will be a vote against the initiation of a single additional Works Progress project in more than 40 States of the Union.

A vote for the amendment will be a vote for the cessation of civic improvement in more than four-fifths of the counties, cities, towns, and villages throughout the Nation.

A vote for the amendment will be a vote for the relief of flourishing American finance and against relief for the languishing American family.

A vote for the amendment will be a vote against the employment, at lifesaving wages, of innumerable faultless, jobless, poverty-stricken men and women.

A vote against the amendment will be a vote to continue the construction of necessary schoolhouses and other public buildings; the improvement of streets and alleys and sewers, and the sanitary conditions of all our centers of population, and the multiplication of the conveniences and comforts of daily life for millions of people.

A vote against the pending amendment will be a vote for the employment of a countless throng of those who are idle, not by choice but because it is impossible for them to find anything to do.

A vote against the amendment will be a vote for roofs over the heads of the homeless, clothes for the backs of the naked, bread for the mouths of the hungry, and blessings for the sick and suffering poor.

It never has been possible, may it never be possible, for me to vote to make deserving men and women idle; to make them homeless; to make them ragged; to make them hungry; to make their innocent little children cry for bread. In the circumstances, I shall, on the pending amendment, plant my feet securely in the tracks of the peerless President and Harry Hopkins, his peerless, patriotic, humanitarian administrator of relief. In this case I shall confidently and enthusiastically follow these two illustrious men who, during the last 4 years, have gone further than any other two men in the entire history of civilization in the matter of making earthly existence not only endurable, but worth while for those who inspired the utterance:

> Knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
> Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll;
> Chill penury repress'd their noble rage,
> And froze the genial current of the soul.

On the approaching roll call, let us vote instant death to the amendment and more abundant life for God's poor, whose only prospect, until recently, was that of ceaseless suffering on earth, and whose only gleam of hope was that of happiness in the kingdom of heaven.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, history is often very impish in dealing with events. Sometimes circumstances and transactions, apparently unnoticed at the time they occur, later loom large in history when the accurate and painstaking historian estimates and appraises their effect.

The speech of the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] caused me to recall that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution was agreed to in the Convention, as the lawyers say, "nemine contradicente"—without contradiction. Yet after 147 years, as the able Senator from Idaho points out, that phrase in the Constitution, "general welfare", is settled in the view that Mr. Hamilton took, and the effect of the Supreme Court's decision lays upon Congress the responsibility for appropriations and taxes.

That decision of the Supreme Court—Commissioner of Internal Revenue against Davis, decided May 24, 1937—is an important event in history, because under it the question of appropriations and taxes is now almost exclusively for Congress to decide.

Another thing as to which history to date has been somewhat impish is Presidential vetoes—that is to say, by failing to reveal their importance. Last summer, after Congress adjourned, I made an investigation of the vetoes of President Franklin Roosevelt. He has vetoed more bills than any other President except President Cleveland; and after my analysis, which required 2 weeks, I assert that President Roosevelt by his vetoes has saved to this country hundreds of millions of dollars. Are Senators aware that he vetoed one bill which alone would have resulted in paying a stale claim approximating $90,000,000?

I was so impressed by the transcendent importance of the services President Roosevelt had rendered to his country by his vetoes that I wrote a statement for the New York Times concerning these vetoes.

I shall read to the Senate the statement I wrote for the Times on July 9, 1936:

> If it be true that Congress loves the people for their votes, it is likewise true that Congress loves President Roosevelt for his vetoes.
> President Roosevelt has vetoed more bills than any other Chief Executive except President Cleveland. In Congress bravery is not required to vote for a bill, but when a Member of Congress votes against a bill he exhibits fortitude.
> I have just completed a thorough examination of the various bills vetoed by President Roosevelt, and candid men must declare that the Franklin Roosevelt vetoes are courageous and in the interests of economy and retrenchment.
> Regarding many, if not most, of the vetoed bills, had President Roosevelt approved them, he would have laid incalculable burdens upon the people; and in not a few instances he would have injected vitality into stale claims of doubtful merit against the Government; indeed, in some cases the bills as to which he withheld approval were not only wholly lacking in merit but called for enormous and wrongful drains upon the Treasury.
> President Roosevelt should receive praise and approbation for the superb service to the people he has quietly rendered in protecting the public revenues by his vetoes.

I invite Senators to examine, for example, the batch of bills that President Roosevelt vetoed at the end of the last session, and they will see that they may safely trust the President. They will perceive that he stood guard over the revenues of the people.

I am content to trust the President, and would rather trust the President than trust Congress on appropriations.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

In pursuit of what we all want—correct history—I am anxious to know if my able friend from Idaho and the eminent chairman of the Judiciary Committee have not both fallen into error in the assertion made respecting the relationship to the Constitution and the respective contributions of effort of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison. The Senators, I fear, have left upon the present Congress the idea that the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Cardozo, has left the conclusion that it was Hamilton who favored the general-welfare clause for general-welfare demands, and that the clause which prescribes that the general welfare of the country is to be guarded by the limitation of taxation was the expression and the creed of Alexander Hamilton.

I ask my able friend from Idaho if he meant to say that Hamilton presented to the Constitutional Convention the idea that the general-welfare clause meant to give to the country the right of taxation for the general welfare, while Mr. Madison represented the thought of limiting it to the mere matter of the national defense. I have understood that the fact was just the reverse. I ask my able friend from Idaho and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee if they do not recall that history is something as follows:

Did not Mr. Hamilton insist that the general-welfare clause, following the clause with reference to the right to tax, levy imposts, and so forth, was to be defined as relating solely to the power of taxation for the national defense, and that it did not carry with it the privilege of going further than the defense of the country required, military or otherwise? Is it not true that Mr. Madison represented the opposite school, and that which we on the Democratic side still today contend for—that the words "general welfare" in the Constitution meant that that which was essential for the welfare of the country, wherever that welfare called for service, was to be taken care of?

It is my viewpoint that the present position as announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the expression from Mr. Justice Cardozo is directly opposed to what the Supreme Court of the United States in its rulings had previously held in the very case we speak of as the A. A. A.; and that the Security case decision was a deliberate reversal, as I construe it, of the construction that the very same Court had made in the Security case under the general-welfare clause.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Idaho rises. May I yield to him?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my understanding is that neither Madison nor Hamilton in the Convention offered the particular clause which we are discussing. My recollection is that that clause came from the Committee on Redrafting, or the Committee on Style, as it is sometimes called. Hamilton did not offer it, nor did Madison, but they both construed it. Hamilton construed it as including the power to lay and collect taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare. Madison construed it as providing for laying and collecting taxes to cover the specific grants which were made in the Constitution to Congress for other purposes, Madison's theory being that it was limited to the specific grants; Hamilton's theory being that the general-welfare clause was a substantive grant, aside from the other specific grants of the Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to say to my able friend that upon examination of the debates, and more acquaintance with the details, it will be disclosed that Hamilton contended that the clause brought in by the committee, which the able Senator designates, must be limited in its construction to the right to lay taxes for the general welfare, meaning purely for the welfare of that which had been described, to wit, the national defense; that Mr. Madison, as I understand, insisted upon the doctrine we speak of as a liberal doctrine, directly opposed to the former, and the one for which the Democrats have contended for 50 years, that the right to levy taxes for the general welfare was to be applied wherever it was essential for the control and the protection of the welfare of the land and its people. There did arise the issue, and in the past 15 years it has received various constructions; but not until lately has the Supreme Court of the United States, reversing itself, conceded that the words "general welfare" must now be construed as referring to such action as would be regarded as necessary to the welfare of the Republic.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

Mr. BORAH. I defer my question.

Mr. GLASS. I was about to suggest that Mr. Madison, in his review of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, clearly pointed out, if I understand the English language, that the levying of taxes for the benefit of any particular group of people was not what was meant by the general-welfare clause.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be, Mr. President, that on that phase, which is not the one on which I assume to express myself at this time, Mr. Madison may have appropriately stated that the right to levy taxes under the general-welfare clause did not give a general privilege to levy general taxes upon all subjects, but was wholly limited to the particular subject then in hand. Where I differ from my able friend from Idaho, if I be not wrong—and, of course, I wish to concede whatever is the truth—is that Mr. Hamilton did not at any time adopt the theory that the general-welfare clause gave the Government any right to take such action, in levying taxes or otherwise, as would justify the view of the Supreme Court of the United States as now given by Mr. Justice Cardozo, but went directly to the opposite. It was Mr. Madison's broad conception which gave us the viewpoint that the words "general welfare" must be construed to mean the general welfare wherever circumstances arise that really concern necessarily the welfare of the Republic.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Let me read a paragraph from Hamilton's Report on Manufactures:

> The term "general welfare" was doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise numerous exigencies incident to the affairs of a nation would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used, because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its revenues should have been restricted within narrower limits than the general welfare, and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars, which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition. * * * The only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question which seems to be admissible is this: That the object to which an appropriation of money is to be made be general and not local, its operation extending in fact or by possibility throughout the Union, and not being confined to a particular spot.

That is quoted from the Government's brief in the A. A. A. case. The Senator was of the opinion, as I understood his statement, that the Court modified its views in the A. A. A. case by the security case.

Mr. LEWIS. I so adopt.

Mr. BORAH. The Court first announced the doctrine of Hamilton in the A. A. A. case and reaffirmed it in the Security case. This brief on the part of the Government was filed in the A. A. A. case, and the unanimous court held to the Hamilton theory in the A. A. A. case, but, if I may be permitted to say so, what seemed to me to be the illogical position of the majority of the Court in the A. A. A. case was that after it was held that we may lay taxes for the general welfare, they then held that agriculture did not come within the general welfare.

It seemed to me that after they had once established the doctrine of Hamilton, the minority in the A. A. A. case were on sound ground. In other words, where we are levying a tax for the general welfare, State lines do not intervene; it is the question of whether or not it is for the general welfare of the United States, and no one contends that agriculture is not incorporated in the general welfare of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not see how anyone can escape the conclusion of what I assert. My two able friends have fallen into the error of adopting the construction, as announced this morning, as the one which Mr. Hamilton had represented and adopted; that the general-welfare clause, as stated, comprehended the right to levy burdens, taxes, and otherwise, wherever such appeared to be for the general welfare of the country. It had been my judgment that Mr. Madison contended that such construction should obtain, and that Mr. Hamilton had opposed, and the very reading of my able friend the Senator from Idaho, if I may call his attention to the fact, from the report on manufactures, is not in support of the view Mr. Hamilton recites, but demonstrates that his view opposing it is correct, because the opposite viewpoint would, as he recites, give so general a latitude as would allow general taxes for the general welfare.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am unable to agree with the Senator on that. What Hamilton contended was that this was a substantial grant to tax for the general welfare. What Madison contended was that it did not add anything whatever to the specific grants in the Constitution to Congress to do certain things, and the dividing line was between the right to tax for a general purpose and the right to tax solely for a specific purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. It does not matter—and with this I conclude my observation, having risen merely to urge that there be a further investigation—whether we are for one construction or the other, this much has to be recorded by history, and the eminent historians of the conning tower called the press gallery can say it comes from Senators, that as a conclusion respecting this opinion we have reached the point where we announce that this Government has experienced a change by which the mere name of "State" is meaningless. Therefore, in the future days of our generation there will be two governments before the country; one will be the Nation, for the general welfare and care of the citizens and the country, and the other will be that local government to which Mr. Jefferson attached so much importance. We speak of it now as "city." Mr. Jefferson referred to it in those days as "county", it then being the local form of government. But the State has no sovereignty, and there is no longer any such organization in this Government as can be regarded a sovereign State as opposed to the sovereignty of the National Government. Such is the result of the last opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, as I have not any time of my own. On page 137 of the Government's brief is found this statement:

> It is said that the general-welfare clause is a limitation on the taxing power; that the clause itself has reference to and is limited by the subsequently enumerated powers; that is, that Congress can tax only to carry out one or more of these latter powers. This is known as the Madisonian theory.

Then it says:

> Thirdly, it is said that while the clause is a limitation on the taxing power, it was intended to embrace objects beyond those included in the subsequently enumerated powers; that is, that, although Congress may not accomplish the general welfare independently of the taxing power, nevertheless it may tax—and appropriate—in order to promote the national welfare by means which may not be within the scope of the other congressional powers. This is commonly known as the Hamiltonian theory.

Then the brief urges that the Hamiltonian theory be adopted and the Madisonian theory rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to add one word to what has been said about the general-welfare clause.

Let us examine briefly the reasons for the inclusion in the Constitution of this particular clause and attempt to set forth its exact meaning. To this end we turn to the Journal of the Convention, August 21, I quote:

> Governor Livingston, from the Committee of Eleven, to whom was referred the propositions respecting the debts of the several States, and also the militia, entered on the 18th instant, delivered the following report:
> "The Legislature of the United States shall have power to fulfill the engagements which have been entered into by Congress, and to discharge as well the debts of the United States and the debts incurred by the several States during the late war, for the common defense and general welfare."

The origin of this proposal lies in the eighth of the Articles of Confederation. There we find that all charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense and general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint.

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled.

It must be admitted that many persons have distorted the meaning of this clause. It is a discussion which goes back to the lifetime of the framers of the Constitution. In a letter to James Madison, in 1830, Andrew Stevenson said that the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" were still regarded by some as conveying to Congress a substantive and indefinite power.

In reply, under date of November 17, 1830, Mr. Madison wrote at length. I commend to all who are interested in the welfare clause to read this letter carefully. After tracing the origin and history of the clause, as well as its course through the Convention, Madison said:

> If it be asked why the terms "common defense" and "general welfare", if not meant to convey the comprehensive power, which taken literally they express, were not qualified and explained by some reference to the particular powers subjoined, the answer is at hand, that although it might easily have been done, yet the omission is accounted for by an inattention to the phraseology, occasioned, doubtless, by its identity with the harmless character attached to it in the instrument from which it was borrowed.

In the writings of Madison is a memorandum relating to the letter I have just mentioned. I find this:

> It was not the intention of the general or of the State conventions to express by the use of the terms "common defense" and "general welfare", a substantive and indefinite power; or to imply that the general terms were not to be explained and limited by the specified power, succeeding, in like manner as they were explained and limited in the former Articles of Confederation from which the terms were taken.

In short, there is no foundation for the fear expressed by Richard Henry Lee in letters to Samuel Adams and the Governor of Virginia in 1787 that this clause would permit the "submission to Congress of every object of human legislation."

It was the opinion of Mr. Madison, apparently, that this had no reference whatever except to the right to appropriate money for the general defense. He places great emphasis upon the fact that the language was carried over from the Articles of Confederation, and that that accounted for the absence of debate in the Constitutional Convention.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as pointed out by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], Mr. Madison always contended that the enumeration of the things for which taxes might be levied constituted the real meaning of the general-welfare clause.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not care to go into the discussion of the subject which has been brought up by the Senator from Idaho more than to state that those Senators who, as the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has done, plant themselves squarely on the doctrine of Jefferson and Madison, are absolutely right in opposing the present administration in the construction of the Constitution as it relates to the general welfare. I said some weeks ago in a speech on the floor of the Senate that the trouble with the country was that the Supreme Court had adopted the Jeffersonian and Madisonian theory of the interpretation of the Constitution as it relates to the general welfare. That is true. The Hamiltonian theory of the construction of the Constitution has been advocated by the present administration as it relates to the general welfare. There can be no doubt about that.

Until recently the Supreme Court had adhered to the Madisonian theory of interpretation. It adhered to the Madisonian and the Jeffersonian doctrine, but within the past few weeks it has gone back to the Hamiltonian interpretation of the Constitution; and I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is exactly correct in what he said, although I dislike to disagree with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is nearly always right.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Supreme Court of the United States had never construed the general-welfare clause until it construed that clause in the A. A. A. case.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. So it had not retreated from any position it had taken. That was the first construction the Supreme Court ever put on the clause; and it construed it in that case in the same way that it afterward construed it in the Securities case. As I said a few moments ago, while the court construed the clause in the A. A. A. case, it seemed to me that it did not follow out logically the result of its construction. If it had, it would have upheld the A. A. A. Act. If there is anything that is a part of the general welfare, it would seem that it would be agriculture.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps I should have referred to the national power generally, rather than to the general welfare. I think it may be truly said that Marshall, during his more than 30 years as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, constantly enlarged and broadened the powers of interpretation, and followed very largely the theories of Mr. Hamilton as against the theories of Mr. Madison. Then when Taney came on the Bench there was a drift toward the Madisonian doctrine, and the Dartmouth College case was modified in the Charles River Bridge case. Afterward, the Dred Scott decision culminated in a good deal of trouble; but the Taney court very largely drifted toward the theory of Madison and away from that of Hamilton.

Then the Civil War came on; and during the war and during the reconstruction period the Court did not amount to very much; but it went back toward Hamilton, and it drifted toward Hamilton's theory on and on, until within the past 25 years it began to go back toward Madison. It continued in that way until the present controversy arose, and now it is drifting over toward Hamilton again.

That is the way I read the history of the Supreme Court.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to add only one word.

I know that in this discussion we have gone very far afield from the pending amendment. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], in his speech when addressing the Senate on the day after the opinion of the Supreme Court in the A. A. A. case was handed down, brought strongly to the mind of the Senate the application of the general-welfare clause, and particularly the reference in the opinion to seeking to evade the intention and the proper construction of the general-welfare clause. What I respectfully urge is that the present tendency—and I may say the declaration of the Supreme Court of the United States of the present day—is in support of the doctrine that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution allows taxation by the Congress upon any subject that the Congress shall find is essential to the welfare of the people. Therefore, the sovereignty of States, to which we have heretofore attached much importance, is practically abolished, from the fact that the authority of the State does not now exist to maintain the sovereignty of its right to levy taxes for relief, as against the authority to tax for that purpose by the Congress under the general-welfare clause.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true with respect to the sovereignty of the State as the result of the War between the States; but the States have rights which must be maintained. However, there has been no such thing as a sovereign State since that question was settled by the arbitrament of arms.

Mr. LEWIS. And the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. And the fourteenth amendment, which followed. That is true.

Let me call attention, however, to the fact that in the second Legal Tender case the Supreme Court in its opinion took the position, as I recall, that the Court must consider emergencies and the conditions in the country, and what effect an opinion would have, in reaching a conclusion. It so said, and it pointed out that if it should hold invalid the greenbacks it would destroy the business of the country, and that for that reason it was constrained to uphold the Legal Tender Act. That was still Hamilton's theory of government, and not Madison's.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up more of the time of the Senate. I believe it wants to vote, and I join with it in that desire; but I wish to say one or two words about the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

It makes no difference to my State, one way or the other, whether the amendment is agreed to or whether it is not. It is broad enough to permit the granting of relief to every section in Kentucky. I believe none of us will dispute the fact that if a municipality or a county or a subdivision of a State has money on hand, it ought to use it for relief if it is calling upon the Federal Government for aid. No harm can result from matching the Federal Government's contribution. If such municipality or subdivison of the State does not have the money on hand, then under the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas the relief may still be extended, because in the States we do not have time to levy and collect the taxes necessary for this purpose even if the taxing power has not been exhausted. It would take a period equal to the life of this legislation to collect taxes; or if the States had to vote a bond issue, it would take a year and a half or 2 years. Consequently, no municipality or subdivision of the State could supply the funds necessary to match the Federal Government's funds. For that reason the amendment does not affect my State one way or the other.

However, I do want to say a few words on the general question of relief. I had hoped we had reached the point where we could abandon it altogether. I know it is a national question, and I cannot pass judgment on what the States, except my own, really need. I have lived in Kentucky all my life. I believe I know Kentucky as well as any Senator knows his own State, having been identified with it in a public manner for almost 35 years in one capacity or another. Kentucky is always an earthly paradise, but it is now a luxurious paradise. The farmers have had the best year they ever had in their lives. The banks are bursting with money. The great coal fields in eastern Kentucky and western Kentucky are operating. The steel mills are operating. The asphalt plants are going all the time. All the great industries in our cities are operating to full capacity. If we cannot get off relief in Kentucky at this time, I do not know when we ever shall be able to do so; and I thought the people in my good State realized that fact. But there was some talk of cutting the appropriation; and many of the various officials in Kentucky, county and State, who have been telling me they can get along without relief, immediately began to cover me up with telegrams, saying it would be a terrible thing to reduce relief at all in my State. So I concluded that since the other sections of the country were going to get relief, the boys there would "take sugar in theirs" just the same as the rest.

I realize that the projects which have been started ought to be completed, and that the appropriation should be sufficient for that purpose; but I believe it is true today that there is no man in Kentucky who is willing and able to work who cannot get a job if he wants to do so. I do not say that that is true in other portions of the country. I know conditions may be different in other places, and I think Kentucky would be exceedingly selfish if she should undertake to deny privileges and benefits to the other States. So, as I have said, in my judgment, the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas does not affect Kentucky one way or the other.

I know that some of the towns which were destroyed or injured by the flood are in very great need of help. They can get it under the amendment if they apply for it. I expect to vote for a continuation of relief, but I do not know how long we shall have an opportunity to vote for it if we continue our present plan. We have almost reached the limit of the national credit. If we should have another depression, there would be no way to get us out of it by the expenditure of more money. Consequently, it would mean inflation, and inflation would mean repudiation, and repudiation would mean the destruction of the national life and the destruction of all values. I am really apprehensive that unless we begin to reduce expenses somewhere we may be approaching the most dangerous crisis our Nation has ever seen. So, while this seems a modest sum to expend for relief, yet we have a tremendous public debt, and it continues to increase; and I very much hope I may very soon see the time when in some manner we may balance the Budget and begin to reduce the public debt.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, in order that the record may be kept straight as to what the Supreme Court has said and done with reference to the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, I wish to call the attention of Senators, for just a moment, to the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against Butler, which, as will be recalled, was the A. A. A. decision. In that opinion they did discuss the welfare clause; in fact, they said that the general-welfare proposition was Hamlet in the case. At page 62 of that opinion, which is found in Two Hundred and Ninety-seventh United States Reports, the Supreme Court, speaking of the contention of the Government, said:

> This contention presents the great and the controlling question in the case—

That is the general-welfare clause.

Then the Court proceeds to a discussion of the views of Hamilton and Madison with reference to the general welfare, and takes the Hamiltonian view and says:

> This Court has noticed the question, but has never found it necessary to decide which is the true construction. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, espouses the Hamiltonian position. We shall not review the writings of public men and commentators or discuss the legislative practice. Study of all these leads us to conclude that the reading advocated by Mr. Justice Story is the correct one.

Therefore, the Hamiltonian theory is the correct one. Then, after the Supreme Court had said that the general-welfare clause was the "Hamlet" in the case, and accepted the Hamiltonian view, they turned around and blandly refused to apply it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I will yield in a moment. I wish to read another quotation from the opinion. At the top of page 68 of the same opinion the Court says:

> We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase "general welfare of the United States", or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MINTON. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to say that while I agreed with the position taken by the Senator from Idaho, that the Court had correctly stated the principle, yet it had reached a wrong conclusion in holding that the welfare of agriculture was merely a local concern and not of general concern.

Mr. MINTON. I do not think they reached any conclusion at all except that they refused to apply the doctrine which they accepted.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I had not intended to address myself to this subject, but its importance to my State is such that I would not be discharging my duty as one of its Senators in this body if I should not at least give the Senate the benefit of my views for whatever they may be worth.

I am not going to suggest any alibi nor apologize for the present administration or the expenditures which it has made. I feel that every expenditure which has been made was justified, was made for the purpose of accomplishing a definite end, and I think, in the main, the expenditures, enormous as they have been, have accomplished that purpose.

The necessity of the National Government providing for the relief of needy and distressed citizens of the United States is something, of course, that we should all like to see obviated, but we have the problem with us and cannot escape it.

Heretofore among the agencies that have assisted in fighting the depression has been the W. P. A. The amendment to the joint resolution under consideration seeks to change the policy which we have pursued during the depression and when the problems which we had to meet were the most difficult. I do not understand that the Federal Government in the matter of providing work for citizens who were unemployed looked at it as strictly a charitable proposition. I think it realized that the local communities and the States were having difficulty in dealing with their unemployment situation, and for that reason, in a dignified way, the National Government provided a fund by the use of which there could be constructed certain works which would afford employment. I understand that contributions were made by the various communities, and that the reason it was necessary to vary the amount of such contributions was in view of the difference in the degree of employment any particular work would afford. Therefore the matter of contributions in the various communities necessarily had to be flexible. I understand that the Works Progress Administration was carried on in that way.

Now we come to what we hope is about the last of the depression, when unemployment is largely localized in the industrial centers and when the farming communities throughout the land are pretty well protected and have fairly well recovered from the depression which engulfed agriculture.

Unfortunately some States have within their borders conditions which attract the unemployed. I can see how New York State and the city of New York may attract unemployed persons; and there is no question that the State of Illinois and the city of Chicago at the present time have needy persons within their borders who are not really citizens of Illinois but who migrated there. So the unemployment problem of Illinois is still continuing.

I wish to speak particularly for my State and to indicate the injustice that might be perpetrated if the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] or the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] should prevail. Illinois, like other States, has carried her part of the public burden. Unlike many of the States, Illinois has paid into the Government millions of dollars more revenue than has been received from the Government for any purpose, either for public buildings in normal times, work relief, unemployment relief, or any of the activities which were intended to counteract the depression. The balance has always been in favor of the State of Illinois, and Illinois should not be penalized because of that fact. Now, when perhaps the very last appropriation the Congress will ever be called upon to make for relief is pending before the Senate, we should not change the policy and say to a State, "Notwithstanding the fact that you have supplied revenue, that you have assisted in every way, that you have done your part in contributing to relief"—and the figures read upon the floor of the Senate show that Illinois has done that—"you shall now be required to pay 25 percent of the cost of any project that is intended to provide relief for unemployment." I say to the Senate that would be manifestly unfair.

The pending amendment simply penalizes those communities whose taxpayers produce the revenues of the Government. The amendment would take from them and give to those who do not produce or who are unable to produce. If the amendment should be adopted, and its provisions be administered as they should be, the President would have to make an investigation not only to determine whether relief is necessary but to determine whether or not a given community is able to contribute 25 percent; and so relief would be placed upon a basis of absolute charity. In other words, every community and every State that wanted to share in this relief, unless they contributed 25 percent, would have to admit that they were insolvent and bankrupt.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If they are bankrupt, why not admit it?

Mr. DIETERICH. If they are bankrupt, they might admit it; but if they are not bankrupt, they should not be forced to say they are, and in the appropriation made from the Federal Treasury those States that have taken care of their citizens who are needy and in distress and that have contributed generously to the fund, should have the same privilege of sharing in it. It is unfair to them to ask them to pay into the Federal Treasury and not receive anything in return.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If they are able to pay, they can pay; and, if they are not able to pay, why should they not admit it?

Mr. DIETERICH. Why not, on the other hand, pass a law requiring every community to pay? Why not pass a law requiring every community that wants to share in this appropriation to contribute its just part? Why penalize those that try to be thrifty and have safeguarded their finances to such an extent that they are able, possibly, by stretching their resources, to raise 25 percent? Why not let it fall alike on all of the States or take it off all of them and not destroy this flexible feature of the program?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. By requiring them to pay 25 percent, we would at least set some standard for all of them instead of allowing the Administrator to proceed as he may see fit.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not care to have the Senator from Texas inject a speech at the time when I am making my address. He can get the floor afterward.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he yielded to me.

Mr. DIETERICH. I understand the Senator's argument, but I am asking for justice for those States that do contribute, and I am asking justice for those communities that are able to contribute; because it is an absolute fact that the communities that have been able to contribute have attracted to their borders a large group of unemployed who do not naturally belong there, and now it is purposed to saddle that burden on them permanently.

I think in justice the joint resolution should be passed by the Senate as it came to us from the House. I am not going to discuss what the administration wants or what it does not want. I am discussing the justice of the proposal. I think the amendment or any other amendment that asks for any contribution should be rejected by the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I want to ask the pardon of the Senator from Illinois for my interruption of his remarks. I labored under some sort of hallucination that he had yielded, and, laboring under such an hallucination, I started to make a suggestion, but learned later when I embarked upon my suggestion that he declined to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois did yield to the Senator from Texas, and later declined to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have heretofore discussed the reason prompting me to offer the amendment which was approved and adopted by the Appropriations Committee. Since that time the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has offered an amendment, an amendment which does not accomplish all that I had hoped would be accomplished by the committee amendment, but which is at least a step in the direction of causing local governments to bear a greater share of the cost of W. P. A. projects.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas has been correctly analyzed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The Senator from Idaho said he did not believe it would effect a very material reduction in Federal expenditures. He said that the provision that the President could, whenever he decided a sponsor was unable to contribute 25 percent, require a smaller contribution, would authorize a continuance of the discretion exercised by the Administrator, but it would tend to establish a standard for the States, counties, and cities, and was therefore desirable.

It is my opinion that the virtue of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, now pending before the Senate, will be to establish a standard and to give to every official of W. P. A. throughout the country an argument to induce a larger contribution by the local sponsors.

When we speak of conferring the power upon the President, we know that is done because in the first lines of the joint resolution the appropriation is made to the President. But in practical operation the determination of the contribution of sponsors is not made by the President of the United States and is not made by the Federal Administrator, but is made by the State administrators in the various States of the Union.

When an application is submitted there is an investigation. The State administrator must determine how much he is going to ask of the sponsor. Today the sponsor can say, "You are asking of this city only 5 percent; of that city 10 percent; so why ask of me 30 or 40 or 50 percent?" If this amendment is adopted, whenever an official of a local government appeals to an administrator of a State, the administrator will say to the sponsor, "The Congress has expressed its sentiment. The Congress believes that if a sponsor is able, the sponsor should pay 25 percent. I think you are able, and therefore you should put up 25 percent."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. As I remember, the statistics from my State show that last year Texas put up 22 percent. Speaking about fairness, why is it not fair to require other States to put up whatever they can up to the extent of 25 percent, and thereby set some sort of standard?

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, that is the theory of the amendment I offered, and also the theory of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

I want Senators to picture the position of the State administrator in any State of the Union. Today there comes to him the president of a State university, for instance. Under the law, in order to qualify as a public project, he must show that the State university is a State-supported institution. When the president of the university proves that his university is State-supported, he then proceeds to show that though State-supported, the State cannot make the contribution to the cost of the project asked by W. P. A., and he asks that it be allowed to procure a project by the contribution of only 5 or 10 or 15 percent.

Under the Robinson amendment, the Administrator of W. P. A. could say to the president of the university, "This is a State-supported institution. If you can ask for a project from Public Works Administration and put up 55 percent, certainly you can put up 25 percent for a W. P. A. project. The Congress has expressed its views that 25 percent should be made the standard, and you should put up at least that much." It would give to the Administrator an argument which he does not now possess. It should result in his securing a larger contribution from many sponsors.

However, it is said by someone who spoke this morning that it would have a tendency to reduce the contribution in some instances to 25 percent. It does not follow that in every case where a sponsor is now contributing more than 25 percent, the Administrator would permit the sponsor to have his project approved by contributing only 25 percent. I assume the Administrator would say, "Congress has said you should contribute at least 25 percent, and I ask you to put up 25 percent. If you cannot do so, then I will determine how much you can contribute."

If that is not sound, then today under existing conditions the State putting up 5 or 10 or 15 percent could insist that it should not put up any more because some other cities or counties or States are not putting up a larger percentage of the cost of projects.

It is said that in the platform of the Democratic Party we declared that relief is a national problem. What did the platform say with reference to relief? It said:

> We believe unemployment is a national problem.

But the platform went on in the same paragraph to make this further declaration:

> We believe that work at prevailing wages should be provided in cooperation with State and local governments on useful public projects.

Not that the National Government should pay the entire expense of work projects, but that "work at prevailing wages should be provided in cooperation with State and local governments." How can local governments cooperate except by putting up some part of the expense? If it is a violation of the platform to say that States must contribute 25 percent, then how could we excuse the action of the Administrator today in requiring an average of 16 percent throughout the country? Up to January 1 the average was 13 percent and since then it has increased to 16 percent.

Another argument offered by Members of the Senate opposed to the amendment, is that it would require an investigation of the financial status of every sponsor. What is done today? Let me read to Senators from the testimony of Mr. Hopkins. I asked him how he proceeded in order to determine what should be contributed by the sponsor in each case; and Mr. Hopkins said:

> We determine it by inquiring into their bonded indebtedness. We inquire into the law as to what legal right they have to increase that indebtedness. We inquire into their taxing ability on other fronts. We inquire into the ability of real estate to stand an increased tax. All of those things are taken into consideration in dealing with a sponsor when they ask us to pay what we think is an unreasonable percentage of the cost. We take into consideration what they are doing out of their own funds on other fronts in connection with the relief problem.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. In other words, the Administrator said the relief authorities inquire into the law to determine the ability of the city or the county to raise funds.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator think it is practical, in providing work relief, to determine that a certain local improvement might be constructed by special taxation, or, if it should be determined that a bond issue might be voted for the purpose of providing the city's or the county's part of the fund, to wait until the proceedings in court might be had and such bond issue determined?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, how practical it is, it would be impossible for me to say, other than that Mr. Hopkins says that is what he is now doing—not what is proposed under the amendment, but what he is now doing.

Mr. DIETERICH. Then, Mr. President, does not the Senator see that if the President is to make the investigation of ability to pay, and he determines—as he must determine if that is the fact—that the city or municipal corporation can pay by starting some proceeding in court whereby, either by special assessment or by the vote of a bond issue, the part of the fund to be raised by the city or the municipal corporation may be provided for, that would practically deny it the right of relief?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, all I can say is that that is what Mr. Hopkins says he has been doing and is now doing. Whether or not it has resulted in denying relief is a matter for the Senator to determine. That is not provided for in this amendment. That is what Mr. Hopkins says he is doing under the existing law.

Mr. DIETERICH. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. The fact that Mr. Hopkins did that does not necessarily mean that this amendment enjoins upon the President the duty of following what Mr. Hopkins did. Mr. Hopkins might have done all those things; but this amendment makes the President determine whether or not the municipality is able to pay 25 percent, and since necessarily it would not have the money in its pocket, the President would have to determine whether it would be able to float a bond issue or to make a special assessment that would raise the money.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, of course I cannot agree with my good friend from Illinois. I have called attention only to what is now being done under existing law, and Mr. Hopkins has done none of the things that the Senator fears. As a matter of fact, under this amendment it is provided that the 25 percent may be contributed in money, materials, or services, just as is now being done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). The time of the Senator from South Carolina on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 20 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I certainly have no intention of using all of it.

The effect of the amendment is just about what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] stated today, and what the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] stated last week. There is in effect no change other than that Mr. Hopkins, who now determines the questions set forth in his testimony, would proceed, under the Robinson amendment, to determine them. The effect and the value of the amendment is that it will give to the State administrators throughout the country an argument to bring about a greater contribution by the local sponsors in every case where they seek a project at the hands of the administrator. They can point out that the Congress has expressed its sentiment that those sponsors who are able to do so, should contribute 25 percent.

Now, one other question.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina further yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BYRNES. I will yield to the Senator once more.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator says the amendment will give the administrators an argument. Does he mean to say, then, that the amendment does not mean what it says; that it simply puts in the mouths of the administrators an argument to use on the municipalities, to try to coerce them into making greater contributions? The amendment does not mean, then, that the relief authorities must follow the amendment as written, and determine whether the locality is or is not able to pay?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think the language speaks for itself, and, by reason of the establishment of a standard, would be bound to furnish an argument to the administrators.

One other argument is made, that this amendment is a restriction upon the power of the President.

We have in the joint resolution as reported a restriction upon the discretion of the Administrator in expenditures. Some Senators had the temerity to call attention to it. They insisted that under the administration of the present law a man often refused to accept private employment because if he got off the W. P. A. relief rolls to accept private employment he would not be restored to those rolls. That is a matter which the Administrator has been handling in his discretion; but the joint resolution specifically provides that hereafter whenever that occurs the man has the right to be restored, and the fact that he has taken private employment cannot be used against him when he asks to be restored to the W. P. A. rolls.

Of course there are upon the rolls some persons who have been on the W. P. A. rolls ever since we established the W. P. A. If Senators are interested in that matter, they should write to their local administrators to find out the percentages in the various States. In some counties in my State 75 percent of the people have been on the rolls and in the employment of W. P. A. ever since it was inaugurated; in others 60 percent and 70 percent. Those are the persons I call career workers.

I believe the amendment we have added to the joint resolution, giving to the persons who secure private employment the right to be restored to the rolls when the private employment ends, will have a most salutary effect upon that situation. It will encourage men to go into private employment.

The last argument which was made by some Senators who are opposed to the amendment is that it is unnecessary to do this in order to balance the Budget. Out of this discussion there has come a realization of the necessity for Congress doing something about the Budget. We cannot transfer to the President of the United States the duty of balancing the Budget. It is the duty of the Congress to levy taxes. It is the duty of the Congress to direct how the money shall be spent. We cannot dodge the responsibility that is ours. The President cannot balance the Budget without the cooperation of the head of every department and without the cooperation of the Congress. The President called to our attention about a month ago the fact that on June 30, 1938, we will be confronted with a deficit of $418,000,000. Now, let us see the situation as of this date.

We know that a farm tenancy bill is to be passed. We know that a housing bill is to be passed. These bills will add at least $50,000,000. I ask Senators to remember that $50,000,000. We are advised that we must appropriate approximately $150,000,000 for a merchant marine. That is $200,000,000. We are advised that a new agricultural bill is pending before the Agricultural Committee, and that an effort is to be made to secure its consideration. It is estimated that it will cost at least $150,000,000 more. That is $350,000,000 more. A bill to be reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, which has already passed the House, reducing the interest on mortgages of the land banks and commissioner loans, will, according to the President, take about $40,000,000 from the Treasury. These appropriations added to the deficit of $418,000,000 estimated by the President will make the deficit on June 30, 1938, at least $800,000,000.

We know that we are going to make an effort to plug the so-called loopholes in the income-tax law. I hope it will be done before we adjourn. Out of it we hope to secure, according to one estimate, $100,000,000; but even with that $100,000,000 we certainly have facing us a possible deficit of $700,000,000 instead of $418,000,000, as estimated by the President about 6 weeks ago.

During the next year what proposals will be made calling for additional expenditures, no man can tell. Every additional expenditure that is made will add to that amount. As the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] said today, if the cities of the country are in such financial condition—and when we say "cities" we must mean the people of the cities—that they cannot contribute 25 percent toward these projects, then we must realize our difficulty in reducing the $36,000,000,000 of indebtedness, and the impossibility of balancing the Budget by the end of the fiscal year on June 30, 1938. No one individual can be blamed for that. It necessitates a realization by the Congress that somebody has to say "no" to the requests that are made for funds. If we do not reduce expenditures, then we must realize that it is our duty to levy additional taxes, because we cannot forever go on without paying our current expenses, much less making an effort to reduce the $36,000,000,000 indebtedness.

Mr. President, I desire to state that I accept the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment of the committee.

Several Senators demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BYRNES. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, of course the Senator cannot accept the amendment to the amendment. I think the yeas and nays were not called on the modification of the amendment suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNES. My understanding of the parliamentary situation is that the vote would come on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair has stated, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from South Carolina stated that he would accept the amendment to the amendment. Of course, he could not do that. It must be voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the statement of the Senator from South Carolina to mean that he personally accepted the amendment to the amendment. Of course, the Senate must vote on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why not have a viva voce vote on the amendment to the amendment, and have a roll call on the amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have suggested the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Chavez	Hughes	Pittman
Andrews	Clark	Johnson, Colo.	Pope
Ashurst	Connally	La Follette	Radcliffe
Austin	Copeland	Lee	Reynolds
Bailey	Davis	Lewis	Robinson

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to again to reannounce the absence of the Senators as stated on the previous roll call and for the reasons assigned at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment, beginning on page 4, line 7, by striking out "40" in line 17, page 4, and inserting in lieu thereof "25"; also to insert a period after the word "services" in line 18; on page 4, including the word "except", it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the amendment down to and including the word "supply", in line 23, page 4, and insert in lieu of the part stricken out the following:

Provided, That if the President shall find any project to be necessary in order to provide work relief in the community where the project is to be located, and that the applicant is unable to supply 25 percent of the cost as herein required, he may authorize the project upon such contribution or assurance of contribution as he finds that the applicant is able to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.]

Mr. BAILEY. We desire to have a roll call.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. BERRY's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BERRY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. However, he is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I am advised that if my colleague were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when Mr. HALE's name was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I understand he has a general pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. If my colleague were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea" on this amendment, and I am advised that the Senator from Texas would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained on important public business.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "yea", and the Senator from Florida would vote "nay."

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]. If present and voting, the Senator from South Carolina would vote "yea", and the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand that prior to my entrance into the Chamber the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] announced the pair between the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BERRY] and myself. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—34

So the amendment of Mr. ROBINSON to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations on page 4, line 7, as amended, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 7, after the word "its", it is proposed to strike out:

Completion; and no non-Federal project shall be undertaken or prosecuted under this appropriation unless and until adequate provision has been made or is assured for financing such part of the entire cost thereof as is not to be supplied from Federal funds.

And to insert:

Completion: Provided further, That after September 30, 1937, no new non-Federal project shall be undertaken or prosecuted under this appropriation unless and until (1) the Works Progress Administrator shall find and certify that adequate provision has been made or is assured for financing such part of the entire cost thereof as is not to be supplied from Federal funds, and (2) at least 40 percent of the cost of the project is to be supplied from non-Federal funds, including money, material, and services, except that in any case in which the applicant for any such non-Federal project certifies in writing that it is unable to supply such 40 percent, the President is authorized, after investigation of the taxpaying capacity and credit of the applicant, to determine the maximum amount possible for such applicant to supply. The President shall furnish to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, upon the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July 1938, a list of cases in which less than 40 percent of the cost of non-Federal projects was furnished by applicants, together with a statement of the amount furnished by the applicant in each such case.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. BARKLEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. BERRY's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BERRY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I am advised that if my colleague were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when Mr. HALE's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and further announce that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. If present, the Senator from Maine would vote "yea", and the Senator from Texas would vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was completed.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained on important public business.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada would vote "yea", and the Senator from Florida would vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay." His general pair has been announced.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 58, as follows:

So the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, as amended, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The next amendment passed over was on page 5, line 4, to strike out "This appropriation shall be available also" and insert "Not exceeding $100,000,000 of this appropriation shall be available for expenditure by the Resettlement Administration."

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking the words "Not exceeding $100,000,000 of". The purpose of this amendment is to permit the Resettlement Administration to use the unexpended balances that were made available in the first deficiency bill of this current session after considerable discussion in the Senate. It is expected that $100,000,000 will be allocated from the fund of one and one-half billion dollars in order to care for the 711,000 farm families that are now being benefited or assisted through the Resettlement Administration. If this limitation be left in the bill it will mean that it will be necessary to strike from the rolls one-quarter of those 711,000 families, or else it will be necessary to abandon the land utilization and development program of the Resettlement Administration.

There are a large number of tracts of land throughout the United States where various projects have been established. In many instances only one-third or one-half of those lands have been actually acquired, due to the time necessary to perfect the titles. If the committee amendment which restricts the amount available to the Resettlement Administration to $100,000,000 remains in the bill it will be impossible to complete those projects. It will mean that many homestead projects will be left in a half-finished condition and cause the loss of much money already expended. It will mean that many people, who in good faith have entered into contracts to sell their land to the Federal Government, will not be able to receive the compensation for their lands. Above all of that, it will mean that the Senate will have directly reversed itself from the action which it took on the first deficiency bill of this year when it was determined that we would permit the completion of all of the projects which already are under way.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator's amendment shall be adopted, then, if I understand correctly, the status will be that whatever amount may be allocated by the President for the Resettlement Administration will be available out of this appropriation, but that, if the language remains as it is proposed by the committee amendment, only $100,000,000 will be available. Is that the situation?

Mr. RUSSELL. The very clear effect of the committee amendment would be to restrict the total expenditures of the Resettlement Administration to $100,000,000. As I have stated, there are now 711,000 farm families scattered throughout the entire United States who are receiving assistance either in the form of loans or of grants out of these funds. It was testified before the committee that it was only expected to expend the sum of $100,000,000 for the current activities of the Resettlement Administration, but they have at this time $32,000,000 in the form of unexpended balances. The Senate by its action on this measure, reappropriated unexpended balances to the credit of other agencies. Why should the Resettlement Administration, of all the Federal agencies which have unexpended balances of allocated funds, not have such unexpended funds reappropriated to them?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's amendment and the reasons he gives for it strike me as being worthy of very serious consideration. Regardless of what anyone may think about the Resettlement Administration—and so far as I am concerned I am, on the whole, in sympathy with it, as I have heretofore indicated—I should certainly not like to see any of the projects under way crippled or left half completed or families who have been moved or are in process of being moved left high and dry or uncared for. I do not know just what the proposal of the Senator from Georgia will do to the whole Resettlement situation, but I am very much interested in what the Senator from Georgia is saying about it, and I hope he will give us the picture in detail as clearly as possible, because I want to go along with what I think is in his mind on the subject.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. If I recall correctly, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky and also the Senator from Georgia, the testimony before the committee—and I am referring to subsistence homesteads—was that no part of the money appropriated in the joint resolution would be devoted to subsistence homesteads; that there were no housing projects of any kind to be provided for by the money to be appropriated. The representatives of the Resettlement Administration said to the committee that when they came before Congress at the time of the deficiency bill, and the appropriation they asked for then was granted them, they proposed to complete the projects out of that money. They told us, further than that, that all they expected to allocate was $100,000,000 for the Resettlement Administration, of which $75,000,000 was to go into the relief agencies and $25,000,000 was to be used in administration expenses. The Senator from Tennessee, who I see rising on the horizon, had much to say about the expenditure of $25,000,000 for administrative purposes, and this language in the joint resolution largely went into it at the instance of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. On page 266 of the hearings Secretary Wallace stated:

> I may say that the $1,500,000,000 under consideration in this particular bill does not include any money for these housing projects. If the funds in the deficiency bill and the previous appropriations are reappropriated to take effect after June 30, we can, out of those existing appropriations which may be reappropriated, clean up the housing projects which are now under way.

Mr. RUSSELL. The point I make is that the language in the joint resolution takes away the opportunity to use the unexpended balances to complete the projects already authorized and on which work has started.

Mr. BYRNES. And the amendment of the Senator proposes to make available the unexpended balance?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; to make available to the Resettlement Administration the unexpended balance, as the unexpended balances have already been made available to every other agency having to its credit unexpended balances, by the action of the Senate in voting down the committee amendment which refused to appropriate the unexpended balances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood, both Secretary Wallace and Mr. Alexander, who I believe is the head of the Resettlement Administration, did not ask for more than $100,000,000, and incidentally they said that it would take $25,000,000 of the $100,000,000 for administration purposes. It seemed to me that that was a very large sum, and I differed with them very considerably about it. They both testified—and I ask the Senator from Georgia, who was also present in the subcommittee, if the statement is not correct—that they both testified they did not intend to carry on any more projects.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not so understand the evidence. They testified that they did not propose to institute any new projects, but they did desire to complete projects which had already been inaugurated.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be; but I wish to say to the Senator that I do not think we ought to give them more than they ask for.

Mr. RUSSELL. Neither do I.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will word his amendment so as to make the amount $100,000,000, I am not going to object, although I think it is a monstrous idea to spend $25,000,000 out of $100,000,000 merely for administration.

Mr. RUSSELL. A short while ago I heard very eloquent words falling from the lips of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee in which he importuned the Senate to be willing to trust the President in the distribution of this entire fund.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am willing to do that; I am willing to vote for the appropriation of $100,000,000 which they ask for; but I am not willing to go further than that. I think the limitation ought to be $100,000,000, and, if that is the meaning of the Senator's amendment, I will go with him.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. If I understand the contention of the Senator from Georgia, it is that, while the amendment authorizes the allocation of $100,000,000 from this appropriation to the Resettlement Administration, that would preclude the allocation of the unexpended balance which in other cases is reappropriated by the joint resolution.

Mr. RUSSELL. Precisely. The unexpended balances are reappropriated for all other agencies under the joint resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. And very clearly the Resettlement Administration would be denied the unexpended balances which have already been contracted for and for which we have already provided unless the committee amendment should be changed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Undoubtedly; unless we proceed to take it out of the pitiful grants and loans of the 711,000 farmers who are now receiving benefits from the Resettlement Administration, the projects cannot be completed and utilized unless the unexpended balances are reappropriated.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, may I ask the Senator from Georgia why we could not insert, after "$100,000,000", the words "plus the unexpended balance" and cure it in that way, and thus leave allocated $100,000,000 plus the unexpended balances?

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask what is the amount of the unexpended balances?

Mr. RUSSELL. The amount for all purposes is, as I recall, $32,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to say that it was estimated that it would cost $25,000,000 to administer $100,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. BORAH. I think such a condition approaches a national scandal.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what it does, but that is the truth.

Mr. BORAH. It simply shows that this money which we are appropriating for the people who ought to have it never gets to them. That is what is happening.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee in what way the $25,000,000 is to be used for administrative purposes?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. I wish to point out that the Senator from Tennessee also offered an amendment, which is found in line 9, page 5, which places responsibility for the cost of administration directly on the President, and that the Senate has already adopted that amendment without any discussion.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

As a compromise, I thought that it was best to leave the matter of the cost of administration to the President. I offered that amendment because I did not believe the President would permit $25,000,000 to be used for the administration of a $100,000,000 fund.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am not here to condone extravagance in the expenses of administration anywhere within the Government, but I think it should be said that the $25,000,000 for administrative expenses is not confined to the administration of the $100,000,000 which it is proposed to expend during the coming year. That fund also goes to defray the administrative expense of every one of these 278 or 279 projects scattered throughout the United States of America. It also provides personnel to supervise the farming activities and the collection of loans from farmers who have borrowed heretofore millions of dollars from the Resettlement Administration. Practically every county in the United States, where there is any agricultural interest of any size, has a representative of the Resettlement Administration whose duty it is to see that the farmers who are being rehabilitated and who have borrowed money for the purchase of livestock and farming tools, repayable, in some instances, over a period of 5 years, pursue sensible farming practices. So it is not strictly correct to say that $25,000,000 of the $100,000,000 is to be used for administrative expenses. It is to be used also to collect and to return to the Treasury of the United States the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been loaned heretofore. It is my recollection that last year there were collected $69,000,000, which went into the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury of the United States, from funds that had been advanced to farmers who were absolutely down and out and who, therefore, had no means to carry on farming operations without the assistance extended by this agency.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. POPE. In that connection I call attention to page 33 of the Senate hearings, where is shown the percentage of expenditures, and in that case it appears that 7.13 percent of the total money expended was used for collection purposes. It seems to me that confirms the statement made by the Senator from Georgia. I think what the Senator just stated about the work of administration is entirely true. It is in no sense limited to the administration of the $100,000,000. It covers the administration of the entire works of the Works Progress Administration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Georgia on the amendment has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then I shall have to take my time on the joint resolution.

I suggest this amendment to the committee amendment, and ask the Senator from Tennessee to give his attention.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. RUSSELL. I suggest inserting after the numerals "$100,000,000" the words "in addition to the amounts necessary to pay the obligations and commitments heretofore made and to complete projects heretofore initiated."

Mr. McKELLAR. I would very much prefer to make it read "not exceeding $100,000,000 and the unexpended balances now in the hands of the Department."

Mr. RUSSELL. That is not practicable, because when we had the first deficiency appropriation bill before us that question was fought out on the matter of appropriating the $14,000,000 unexpended balance. That was done, and the President has not yet allocated those funds, and they are still included in the total amount appropriated generally for relief purposes in January.

Mr. McKELLAR. Inasmuch as the amendment at the end of the sentence has not been agreed to, as I understand, but the Senator from Georgia is willing to have it agreed to——

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee has been agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it has already been agreed to, then I shall not object to the language suggested by the Senator from Georgia because it will put the burden on the President to determine about this enormous cost of administration, which I think the President will reduce very materially.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am satisfied that the hearings before the subcommittee showed a reduction of some $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 had already been made in the cost of administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true, but unquestionably the Administrator of this activity stated to the committee that what he wanted was $100,000,000 and that it would take $25,000,000 of that sum to administer it. That is what I want to guard against in this amendment as far as it can be done.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator from Tennessee had listened to all the evidence he would have caught the fact that the $25,000,000 was also to administer and recapture for the Treasury of the United States between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 heretofore expended through the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask who it is that administers and distributes this $25,000,000 which has been referred to here?

Mr. RUSSELL. I assume primarily the Secretary of Agriculture, through the Resettlement Administration, which is a part of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has not been in charge of the Resettlement Administration very long. That Administration was for a long time in the hands of Tugwell. He resigned and a man by the name of Alexander was appointed and I know very little about him. I shall not say anything further about him, but I do trust the Secretary of Agriculture. I think he will properly conduct this division in his Department. For that reason I have agreed to the amendment and for that reason I am willing to agree to the additional words suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator from Tennessee insist on having this additional language in the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes. It ought to be inserted in the amendment by all means after "$100,000,000." I am not binding anybody but myself, may I say to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], who shakes his head at me, when I make that statement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee another question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Tennessee has offered an amendment placing the responsibility upon the President for this expenditure?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. That means, of course, it is actually put upon the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, and I believe Mr. Wallace will take a very different view about the expenditures which are made.

Mr. BORAH. Who is the person that came before the committee and testified it would require this amount to administer the fund?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Alexander, head of the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. BORAH. He is under Mr. Wallace?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; he is under Mr. Wallace.

Mr. BORAH. Evidently he spoke with some authority?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; he spoke with some authority.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, while I still have a bit of time left I want to complete my statement with reference to the amendment, and then I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "not exceeding $100,000,000" and inserting before the word "this", in line 6, the following words:

> In addition to the amounts necessary to pay obligations and commitments heretofore made and to complete projects heretofore initiated—

Oh, no! This language was handed to me on the floor a moment ago, coming from an official of the Resettlement Administration, evidently drafted with a view to leaving the sum of $100,000,000 in the bill. In view of the action of the Senate in deciding to appropriate these funds, as they have always been appropriated heretofore, to the President to be allocated by him, I shall leave the amendment to stand on the basis of striking out the restriction on the appropriation and leaving it in the hands of the President of the United States to say how much shall be allocated to the Resettlement Administration. There is sound reason for that. No man knows how far reaching the droughts from which we have suffered may go in the future. No man can tell just what might be necessary to do in view of crop failures in certain sections. This is the only place where the 30,000,000 farm families of the United States can come to secure any benefits from the gigantic sums we have been appropriating for relief purposes and no restrictions upon the amount which may be necessary should be imposed without more careful investigation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator if that is not substantially what we voted 2 to 1 in the Senate about a month ago?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is exactly in accord with the action of the Senate on the first deficiency bill. If this amendment is left in the bill as at present worded, it will constitute a revocation of the action of the Senate in appropriating for the Resettlement Administration in the first deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Is it not necessary for some such language as the Senator offered to be inserted in the bill in order to enable the Resettlement Administration to carry out existing contracts, unless we reduce the $100,000,000?

Mr. RUSSELL. I so stated at the outset of my remarks, when there was considerable confusion in the Senate, that if the $100,000,000 limitation were left in the bill it would mean a great loss in that the administration would be unable to fully utilize the projects already instituted, or else it would mean that thousands of farm families ruthlessly, out of hand, must be stricken from the relief rolls and refused assistance from the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not see any reason why the committee inserted this limitation. It seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] ought to be accepted by the committee.

From my limited observation of it, the Resettlement Administration has done some very important work that has not been attended to by the various other bureaus and organizations which have had to do with the drought situation. I know that what the Senator from Georgia said is 100 percent true, that we do not know now what the demands are going to be from some of the drought-stricken portions of the country. There are many indications that there will be considerable demand made in that direction.

My observation during the past year has been that where farmers were suffering, particularly in the drought-stricken area, on account of the difficulties that arose because of the drought they were unable to get any relief whatever anywhere except through the Resettlement Administration. I do not know what the result has been all over the country; but, judging from the limited parts of it that I have been able to observe, the Resettlement Administration in a great many instances was the only source of relief left to some of the worst afflicted people of whom I know.

Why should we put on this limitation? There may be some reason for it that I do not understand; but, so far as I know, there has not been any complaint of anything wrong with the Resettlement Administration. It seems to me it has done a wonderful work, and I think there is danger of handicapping it; and what good does the limitation do, anyway? It does not affect the amount of money that is appropriated. It does not say anything shall be allocated for the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. It will depend upon circumstances which I believe we cannot fully comprehend or know about at the present time; so why not leave the provision just as it was?

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that is exactly what I wanted to ask the Senator. Would not the result be accomplished by simply defeating the committee amendment, so that the joint resolution would read as it came from the House in that respect?

Mr. NORRIS. It may be. I am not sure about that.

Mr. BYRNES. I think that would accomplish exactly what the Senator has in mind, and certainly I believe it would be the best way to solve the difficulty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was my understanding that at the conclusion of his remarks, or near that point, the Senator from Georgia, who first offered an amendment adding certain words to the committee amendment, decided that the correct course is to reject the committee amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. It will have exactly the same effect.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, why not do it? Then the proper thing to do is simply to reject the committee amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. The only difficulty is that the Senate has already adopted a part of the committee amendment in line 9 on page 5, "including such cost of administration as the President may direct."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is in error according to the record at the desk. The amendment to which he refers was passed over.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was going on my recollection of the matter. I thought the Senator from Oregon rose and asked to have the first part of this amendment passed over.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia whether we would not accomplish the desired purpose by rejecting this committee amendment and the other committee amendment in line 9.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, that would give the President all the authority that is needed to deal with the Resettlement Administration.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what he now has.

Mr. RUSSELL. But I supported the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee with regard to the administrative expenses referred to in line 9, which was a compromise within the subcommittee. The view expressed by the Senator from Tennessee was that some limitation should be placed on the administrative expenses, and it was finally compromised by making the administrative expenses subject to the President's discretion.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how we can tell now just what will be necessary. That has been true in a great portion of the Mississippi Valley, where the only relief left was the Resettlement Administration; and the necessity for it often came about on account of drought, grasshopper affliction, or some similar occurrence, some happening of nature. It seems to me it is quite a safeguard with which we ought not to interfere.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion which I think may solve the problem?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. As I understand, the Senator from Georgia, so far as the $100,000,000 limitation for the purposes covered by the testimony is concerned, he has no objection to the limitation. What the Senator from Georgia is uneasy about is the fact that there are not carried over the unexpended funds heretofore appropriated for the Resettlement Administration. If the $100,000,000 were available, plus the funds heretofore appropriated for the Resettlement Administration, but unexpended, it would meet the Senator's problem, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Georgia has not the only problem involved in this joint resolution or in this amendment. There are other Senators here who are interested in the problem; and I think at the present time any limitation would be unwise, for the reasons I have given.

I do not claim to know and do not know, of course, what the effect has been all over the country. I have not investigated the Resettlement Administration, and there may be some reason that I do not know why this language should be in the joint resolution; but I have not heard of any.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, no agency of the Government has been more creditable in its purpose and in its operations than has the Resettlement Administration in its rehabilitation services. Every member of the committee recognized that fact; but in this lump appropriation there is a billion and a half dollars, and limitations have been put upon roads and upon the Youth Administration. If this part of the appropriation were left without limitation, the entire billion and a half dollars, plus the unexpended balances, could be spent for resettlement. The only purpose some of us had was to place upon the Resettlement Administration a proper limitation of the character that was applied to the other agencies of the Government, so that one could not reach in and take from the compartments that were allocated to the others.

The representatives of the Resettlement Administration said that $100,000,000 was adequate for their rehabilitation purposes, as I read the testimony. They were not thinking that perhaps the unexpended balances might be taken away; and under the clause that is now in the joint resolution, as I gather from the Senator from Georgia, he fears—and I think justifiably so—that the unexpended balances of appropriations for resettlement have been put into this common pool; and if they can be taken out of that pool and still made applicable to the Resettlement Administration, it will add that amount and will protect the existing situation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will be so generous as to yield to me a moment longer——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me use just a little of my own time. It is nearly gone. Senators have forgotten that I should like to use what little time I have left.

The explanation given by the Senator from Colorado is rather satisfactory to me. It appeals to me as being reasonable. It may be that what he suggests is all that will be necessary. If we limit every other expenditure in the joint resolution, it may be perfectly reasonable to limit this one; but certainly it ought not to be limited to $100,000,000.

The Senator from Georgia has well explained that in a prior amendment, agreed to by the Senate after a long discussion, we appropriated an unexpended balance, and that if no modification were made of this limitation that unexpended balance would be of no benefit whatever to the Resettlement Administration. I hope the matter can be worked out satisfactorily, but I do not think we ought to take any chance on crippling the Resettlement Administration. I am glad to hear the Senator from Colorado—who, I concede, knows more about the matter than I do—say that it is above reproach, and has done a wonderful work. I happen to know instances where that is true, and I am glad to learn that the condition is general over the country.

So I hope the Senator from Georgia will not make any agreement that will limit this appropriation to $100,000,000. I am rather convinced that the better way to meet the difficulty would be to reject this entire committee amendment, and the one on page 9.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has well stated that the Senator from Georgia is making no agreement that would bind anyone except himself. So far as I am concerned, in view of the statement of the Chair that this amendment has not been adopted in part, I think the best procedure to follow is to vote down the committee amendment in its entirety and leave the language as it came from the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator would have no objection to the last part of the amendment, would he, "including such cost of administration as the President may direct"?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not the slightest. I think the President now has the right to decide as to the cost of administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so, too; but, according to what was said to us, the last part of the amendment will be of value.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing to assent to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska to strike out the first part of the committee amendment and leave in the last part.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Georgia and others interested in the debate that I am about to speak for some little time, perhaps as long as the limitation on debate will permit; and they may have an opportunity during that time to reconcile their differences as to the pending matter.

Earlier in the day there was some discussion in the Chamber as to the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, as to its meaning, and as to the interpretation put upon it by the present administration and by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asserted the belief that the Supreme Court, in its recent decision, had accepted the Hamiltonian theory with respect to this clause of our Constitution, and had rejected the theory of Madison, which had been followed for most of our life as a Nation since the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the administration itself has taken a position far in advance of the Hamiltonian theory of construction of this clause of the Constitution, and I have been fearful that the Supreme Court itself has gone to that extreme. I desire somewhat further to explore this question, and to place in the RECORD some historical matter bearing thereon. Some part of what I say will be original, but I shall be guilty of almost shameless plagiarism in what I present to the Senate.

THE PHRASE "TO LAY AND COLLECT TAXES * * * AND PROVIDE FOR THE COMMON DEFENSE AND GENERAL WELFARE OF THE UNITED STATES", AS USED IN THE CONSTITUTION, DOES NOT CONFER ON CONGRESS BROAD AND UNLIMITED POWERS TO ENACT LEGISLATION FOR SUCH PURPOSES

It is the contention of the President, and of other administration spokesmen, that Congress has ample broad powers to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

The preamble of the Constitution, which reads:

We the people of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

is considered by the President, and other administration spokesmen, as evidence of the extent of the powers intended to be conferred, and which they claim are conferred, on Congress by the Constitution.

That the preamble of the Constitution has nothing whatever to do with the powers conferred on Congress by that document is beyond question. Nor is there anything in the records of the proceedings of the Federal Convention which in any way indicates that any of the members of that Convention had any intent that the preamble was to be taken into consideration in determining the powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution. On the contrary, the sole object of the preamble was merely to declare that the then existing form of government was not sufficient for the interests of the people, and was merely a declaration of the necessity for establishing a more definite form of government than then existed. The preamble did not create any powers. This is made clear in the resolutions offered to the Convention on May 29, 1787, by Edmund Randolph, then Governor of Virginia. Mr. Randolph's resolutions contained the statement that (Records of the Federal Convention, Farrand, vol. II, pp. 137–138):

A preamble seems proper not for the purpose of designating the ends of government and human politics.

And then, after giving the reasons for a preamble, it is stated in the resolutions:

Let it be next declared that the following are the Constitution and fundamentals of government for the United States.

The President in his radio address of March 9, 1937, after referring to the preamble, said that the powers given to Congress to carry out the purposes of the Constitution "were all the powers needed to meet each and every problem which then had a national character and which could not be met by merely local action." He then said that "the framers went further", and "having in mind that in succeeding generations many other problems then undreamed of would become national problems, they gave to Congress the ample broad powers 'to levy taxes * * * and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.'"

Disregarding the language of the preamble, which does not confer any power, we then find that the only other reference in the Constitution to the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" is in article I, section 8. To keep in mind the provisions of section 8, I quote it in its entirety:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. President, what does this language mean? What did it mean to the framers of the Constitution? What did it mean to those who contemporaneously construed the Constitution?

The terms "common defense" and "general welfare" were in the old Articles of Confederation, which provided for a limited form of government. When the first general propositions were presented to the Federal Convention on May 29, 1787, as a basis for discussion of the form of a Constitution, the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" appeared therein. However, between May and August 1787 the terms were evidently dropped from the revised drafts, for they do not again appear in any drafts or revisions between those dates. In August the terms again appear in forms of amendments submitted, and on September 4, 1787, a committee reported the following revision:

The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare.

From that time on, so far as the records of the Convention disclose, the clause "common defense and general welfare" was retained up to September 17, 1787, when the Constitution was agreed to. So far as I know the records of the Convention show no debate or discussion whatever with respect to the terms "common defense" or "general welfare."

Shortly after the ratification of the Constitution, the question arose as to whether the phrase, "To lay and collect taxes * * * and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States", as used in article I, section 8, of the Constitution, conferred on Congress unlimited powers to enact legislation for such purposes, or whether it conferred only limited powers.

The question developed sharp differences of opinion pro and con. It is therefore necessary to examine the opinions and views that have been expressed from time to time on the question involved.

We shall take up first the opinions and views of James Madison, who was one of the most active and influential members of the Federal Convention, and to whom Daniel Webster referred on October 3, 1837 (25th Cong., 1st sess.), as an authority and interpreter of the Constitution, in the following language:

Mr. Madison, all will admit, is a competent witness, he had as much to do as any man in framing the Constitution, and as much to do as any man in administering it. Nobody among the living or the dead is more fit to be consulted on a question growing out of it.

John C. Calhoun, in the Senate, on February 18, 1837 (24th Cong., 2d sess.), said:

* * * that we were indebted to Mr. Madison at least as much as to any other man for the form of government under which we live. Indeed, he might be said to have done more for our institutions than any man now living or that had gone before him.

Madison, on February 7, 1792, in addressing himself to the cod fisheries bill, which contained a provision granting a direct bounty on occupations (Annals of Congress, 2d Cong., 1st sess, vol. 3, pp. 386–389), said:

It is supposed by some gentlemen that Congress have authority not only to grant bounties in the sense here used, merely as a commutation for drawbacks, but even to grant them under a power by virtue of which they may do anything which they may think conducive to the "general welfare." This, sir, in my mind, raises the important and fundamental question, whether the general terms which had been cited, are to be considered as a sort of caption or general description of the specified powers, and as having no further meaning and giving no further power than what is found in that specification; or as an abstract and indefinite delegation of power extending to all cases whatever; to all such, at least, as will admit the application of money, which is giving as much latitude as any government could well desire.

I, sir, have always conceived—I believe those who proposed the Constitution conceived, and it is still more fully known, and more material to observe that those who ratified the Constitution conceived—that this is not an indefinite government, deriving its powers from the general terms prefixed to the specified powers, but a limited government, tied down to the specified powers which explain and define the general terms. The gentlemen who contend for a contrary doctrine are surely not aware of the consequences which flow from it, and which they must either admit or give up their doctrine.

It will follow, in the first place, that if the terms be taken in the broad sense they maintain, the particular powers afterward so carefully and distinctly enumerated would be without any meaning and must go for nothing. It would be absurd to say, first, that Congress may do what they please, and then that they may do this or that particular thing; after giving Congress power to raise money, and apply it to all purposes which they may pronounce necessary to the general welfare, it would be absurd, to say the least, to superadd a power to raise armies, to provide fleets, etc. In fact, the meaning of the general terms in question must either be sought in the subsequent enumeration which limits and details them, or they convert the Government from one limited, as hitherto supposed, to the enumerated powers into a government without any limits at all.

It is to be recollected that the terms "common defense and general welfare", as here used, are not novel terms, first introduced into this Constitution. They are terms familiar in their construction and well known to the people of America. They are repeatedly found in the old Articles of Confederation, where, although they are susceptible of as great latitude as can be given them by the context here, it was never supposed or pretended that they conveyed any such power as is now assigned to them. On the contrary, it was always considered as clear and certain that the old Congress was limited to the enumerated powers, and that the enumeration limited and explained the general terms. I ask the gentlemen themselves whether it ever was supposed or suspected that the old Congress could give away the moneys of the States in bounties, to encourage agriculture, or for any other purpose they pleased? If such a power had been possessed by that body, it would have been much less impotent, or have borne a very different character from that universally ascribed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. Does he desire to proceed on the joint resolution?

Mr. WHITE. I will speak on the joint resolution. I continue the quotation from Madison on the cod fisheries bill:

The novel idea now annexed to these terms, and never before entertained by the friends or enemies of the Government, will have a further consequence, which cannot have been taken into the view of the gentlemen. Their construction would not only give Congress the complete legislative power I have stated—it would do more—it would supersede all the restrictions understood at present to lie on their power with respect to the judiciary. It would put it in the power of Congress to establish courts throughout the United States, with cognizance of suits between citizen and citizen, and in all cases whatsoever. This, sir, seems to be demonstrable; for if the clause in question really authorizes Congress to do whatever they think fit, provided it be for the general welfare, of which they are to judge, and money can be applied to it, Congress must have power to create and support a judiciary establishment, with a jurisdiction extending to all cases favorable, in their opinion, to the general welfare, in the same manner as they have power to pass laws and apply money, providing in any other way for the general welfare.

* * * * * * * * *

* * * If Congress can apply money indefinitely to the general welfare, and are the sole and supreme judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may establish teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of the Public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may undertake the regulation of all roads, other than post roads. In short, everything from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress; for every object I have mentioned would admit the application of money, and might be called, if Congress pleased, provisions for the general welfare.

The language held in various discussions of this House is a proof that the doctrine in question was never entertained by this body. Arguments, wherever the subject would permit, have constantly been drawn from the peculiar nature of the Government, as limited to certain enumerated powers, instead of extending, like other governments, to all cases not particularly excepted. * * *

* * * I venture to declare it as my opinion, that were the power of Congress to be established in the latitude contended for, it would subvert the very foundation, and transmute the very nature of the limited Government established by the people of America; * * *.

Madison, in a letter, dated November 17, 1830, to Alexander Stevenson, gives the history of, and discusses at length, "common defense" and "general welfare", as used in the Constitution. The letter is enlightening and instructive. It is, in part, as follows (The Records of the Federal Convention, Farrand, vol. III, pp. 483–494):

* * * * * * * * *

In tracing the history and determining the import of the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" as found in the text of the Constitution the following lights are furnished by the printed Journal of the Convention which formed it.

The terms appear in the general propositions offered May 29 as a basis for the incipient deliberations, the first of which "Resolved, that the Articles of the Confederation ought to be so corrected and enlarged as to accomplish the objects proposed by their institution, namely—common defense, security of liberty, and general welfare." On the day following, the proposition was exchanged for "Resolved, that a Union of the States merely federal will not accomplish the objects proposed by the Articles of Confederation; namely, common defense, security of liberty, and general welfare."

The inference from the use here made of the terms and from the proceedings on the subsequent propositions is, that although common defense and general welfare were objects of the Confederation, they were limited objects, which ought to be enlarged by an enlargement of the particular powers to which they were limited—and to be accomplished by a change in the structure of the Union from a form merely federal to one partly national, and as these general terms are prefixed in the like relation to the several legislative powers in the new charter, as they were in the old, they must be understood to be under like limitations in the new as in the old.

In the course of the proceedings between the 30th of May and the 6th of August the term "common defense" and "general welfare", as well as other equivalent terms, must have been dropped for they do not appear in the draft of a Constitution, reported on that day by a committee appointed to prepare one in detail; the clause in which those terms were afterward inserted, being, simply in the draft "The Legislature of the United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes duties, imposts, and excises."

The manner in which the terms became transplanted from the old into the new system of government is explained by a course somewhat adventitiously given to the proceedings of the Convention.

On the 18th of August, among other propositions referred to the committee which had reported the draft was one "to secure the payment of the public debt", and

On the same day was appointed a committee of 11 Members (one from each State) "to consider the necessity and expediency of the debts of the several States being assumed by the United States."

On the 21st of August this last committee reported a clause in the words following: "The Legislature of the United States shall have power to fulfill the engagements which have been entered into by Congress and to discharge as well the debts of the United States as the debts incurred by the several States during the late war for the common defense and general welfare; conforming herein to the eighth of the Articles of Confederation, the language of which is that "all charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense and general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury", etc.

On the 22d of August the committee of five reported, among other additions to the clause giving power "to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and excises", a clause in the words following: "for payment of the debts and necessary expenses", with a proviso qualifying the duration of revenue laws.

This report being taken up, it was moved as an amendment that the clause should read: "the Legislature shall fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States."

It was moved to strike out "discharge the debts" and insert "liquidate the claims", which being rejected, the amendment was agreed to as proposed, viz, "the Legislature shall fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States."

On the 23d of August the clause was made to read "the Legislature shall fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States and shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises", the two powers relating to taxes and debts being merely transposed.

On the 25th of August the clause was again altered so as to read: "all debts contracted and engagements entered into by or under the authority of Congress (the Revolutionary Congress) shall be as valid under this Constitution as under the Confederation."

This amendment was followed by a proposition (referring to the powers to lay and collect taxes, etc., and to discharge the debts (old debts)) to add "for payment of said debts, and for defraying the expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense and general welfare." The proposition was disagreed to, one State only voting for it.

September 4: The Committee of Eleven reported the following modification: "The Legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare", thus retaining the terms of the Articles of Confederation and covering by the general term "debts" those of the old Congress.

A special provision in this mode could not have been necessary for the debts of the new Congress. For a power to provide money, and a power to perform certain acts of which money is the ordinary and appropriate means, must, of course, carry with them a power to pay the expense of performing the acts. Nor was any special provision for debts proposed till the case of the Revolutionary debts was brought into view, and it is a fair presumption from the course of the varied propositions which have been noticed that but for the old debts and their association with the terms "common defense and general welfare" the clause would have remained as reported in the first draft of a Constitution, expressing generally a "power in Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises", without any addition of the phrase "to provide for the common defense and general welfare." With this addition, indeed, the language of the clause being in conformity with that of the clause in the Articles of Confederation, it would be qualified, as in those Articles, by the specification of powers subjoined to it. But there is sufficient reason to suppose that the terms in question would not have been introduced but for the introduction of the old debts, with which they happened to stand in a familiar though inoperative relation. Thus introduced, however, they passed undisturbed through the subsequent stages of the Constitution.

If it be asked why the terms "common defense and general welfare", if not meant to convey the comprehensive power which, taken literally, they express, were not qualified and explained by some reference to the particular powers subjoined, the answer is at hand that, although it might easily have been done, and experience shows it might be well if it had been done, yet the omission is accounted for by an inattention to the phraseology, occasioned, doubtless, by its identity with the harmless character attached to it in the instrument from which it was borrowed.

But may it not be asked with infinitely more propriety, and without the possibility of a satisfactory answer, why, if the terms were meant to embrace not only all the powers particularly expressed but the indefinite power which has been claimed under them, the intention was not so declared; why, on that supposition, so much critical labor was employed in enumerating the particular powers and in defining and limiting their extent?

The variations and vicissitudes in the modification of the clause in which the terms "common defense and general welfare" appear are remarkable, and to be not otherwise explained than by differences of opinion concerning the necessity or the form of a constitutional provision for the debts of the Revolution, some of the Members apprehending improper claims for losses by depreciated emissions of bills of credit, others an evasion of proper claims if not positively brought within the authorized functions of the new Government, and others again considering the past debts of the United States as sufficiently secured by the principle that no change in the Government could change the obligations of the Nation. Besides the indications in the Journal, the history of the period sanctions this explanation.

But it is to be emphatically remarked, that in the multitude of motions, propositions, and amendments, there is not a single one having reference to the terms "common defense and general welfare", unless we were so to understand the proposition containing them, made on August 25, which was disagreed to by all the States except one.

The obvious conclusion to which we are brought is, that these terms copied from the Articles of Confederation were regarded in the new as in the old instrument merely as general terms, explained and limited by the subjoined specifications; and therefore requiring no critical attention or studied precaution.

If the practice of the Revolutionary Congress be pleaded in opposition to this view of the case, the plea is met by the notoriety that on several accounts the practice of that body is not the expositor of the Articles of Confederation. These articles were not in force till they were finally ratified by Maryland in 1781. Prior to that event the power of Congress was measured by the exigencies of the war, and derived its sanction from the acquiescence of the States. After that event, habit and a continued expediency, amounting often to a real or apparent necessity, prolonged the exercise of an undefined authority; which was the more readily overlooked; as the Members of the body held their seats during pleasure, as its acts, particularly after the failure of the bills of credit, depended for their efficacy on the will of the States; and as its general impotency became manifest. Examples of departure from the prescribed rule are too well known to require proof. The case of the old Bank of North America might be cited as a memorable one. The incorporating ordinance grew out of the inferred necessity of such an institution to carry on the war, by aiding the finances which were starving under the neglect or inability of the States to furnish their assessed quotas. Congress was at the time so much aware of the deficient authority, that they recommended it to the State legislatures to pass laws giving due effect to the ordinance, which was done by Pennsylvania and several other States. In a little time, however, so much dissatisfaction arose in Pennsylvania where the bank was located, that it was proposed to repeal the law of the State in support of it. This brought on attempts to vindicate the adequacy of the power of Congress to incorporate such an institution. Mr. Wilson, justly distinguished for his intellectual powers, being deeply impressed with the importance of a bank at such a crisis, published a small pamphlet, entitled, "Considerations on the Bank of North America", in which he endeavored to derive the power from the nature of the Union, in which the Colonies were declared and became independent States; and also from the tenor of the Articles of Confederation themselves. But what is particularly worthy of notice is, that with all his anxious search in those Articles for such a power, he never glanced at the terms "common defense and general welfare" as a source of it. He rather chose to rest the claim on a recital in the text, "that for the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, Delegates shall be annually appointed to meet in Congress, which he said implied that the United States had general rights, general powers, and general obligations; not derived from any particular State, nor from all the particular States, taken separately, but resulting from the Union of the whole" these general powers, not being controlled by the Article declaring that each State retained all powers not granted by the Articles, because "the individual States never possessed and could not retain a general power over the others."

The authority and argument here resorted to, if proving the ingenuity and patriotic anxiety of the author on one hand, show sufficiently on the other, that the terms "common defense and general welfare", could not according to the known acceptation of them avail his object.

That the terms in question were not suspected, in the Convention which formed the Constitution of any such meaning as has been constructively applied to them, may be pronounced with entire confidence. For it exceeds the possibility of belief, that the known advocates in the Convention for a jealous grant and cautious definition of Federal powers, should have silently permitted the introduction of words or phrases in a sense rendering fruitless the restrictions and definitions elaborated by them.

Consider for a moment the immeasurable difference between the Constitution limited in its powers to the enumerated objects; and expanded as it would be by the import claimed for the phraseology in question. The difference is equivalent to two Constitutions, of characters essentially contrasted with each other; the one possessing powers confined to certain specified cases; the other extending to all cases whatsoever: For what is the case that would not be embraced by a general power to raise money, a power to provide for the general welfare, and a power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry these powers into execution; all such provisions and laws superseding, at the same times, all local laws and constitution at variance with them. Can less be said with the evidence before us furnished by the Journal of the Convention itself, than that it is impossible that such a Constitution as the latter would have been recommended to the States by all the members of that body whose names were subscribed to the instrument.

Passing from this view of the sense in which the terms common defense and general welfare were used by the framers of the Constitution, let us look for that in which they must have been understood by the conventions, or rather by the people who through their conventions, accepted and ratified it. And here the evidence is if possible still more irresistible that the terms could not have been regarded as giving a scope to Federal legislation, infinitely more objectionable, than any of the specified powers which produced such a strenuous opposition, and calls for amendments which might be safeguards against the dangers apprehended from them.

Without recurring to the published debates of those Conventions, which as far as they can be relied on for accuracy, would it is believed not impair the evidence furnished by their recorded proceedings, it will suffice to consult the lists of amendments proposed by such of the conventions as considered the powers granted to the new Government too extensive or not safely defined.

Besides the restrictive and explanatory amendments to the text of the Constitution it may be observed, that a long list was premised under the name and in the nature of "Declarations of Rights"; all of them indicating a jealousy of the Federal powers, and an anxiety to multiply securities against a constructive enlargement of them. But the appeal is more particularly made to the number and nature of the amendments proposed to be made specific and integral parts of the Constitution text.

No less than seven States, it appears, concurred in adding to their ratifications, a series of amendments, which they deemed requisite. Of these amendments 9 were proposed by the convention of Massachusetts; 5 by that of South Carolina; 12 by that of New Hampshire; 20 by that of Virginia; 33 by that of New York; 26 by that of North Carolina; 21 by that of Rhode Island.

Here are a majority of the States, proposing amendments, in one instance 33 by a single State; all of them intended to circumscribe the powers granted to the general Government by explanations, restrictions, or prohibitions, without including a single proposition from a single State, referring to the terms, common defense and general welfare; which if understood to convey the asserted power, could not have failed to be the power most strenuously aimed at because evidently more alarming in its range, than all the powers objected to put together. And that the terms should have passed altogether unnoticed by the many eyes which saw danger in terms and phrases employed in some of the most minute and limited of the enumerated powers, must be regarded as a demonstration, that it was taken for granted that the terms were harmless, because explained and limited, as in the Articles of Confederation, by the enumerated powers which followed them.

A like demonstration, that these terms were not understood in any sense that could invest Congress with powers not otherwise bestowed by the constitutional charter may be found in what passed in the first session of the first Congress, when the subject of amendments was taken up, with the conciliatory view of freeing the Constitution from objections which had been made to the extent of its powers, or to the unguarded terms employed in describing them. Not only were the terms "common defense and general welfare", unnoticed in the long list of amendments brought forward in the outset; but the Journals of Congress show that in the progress of the discussions, not a single proposition was made in either branch of the Legislature which referred to the phrase as admitting a constructive enlargement of the granted powers, and requiring an amendment guarding against it. Such a forbearance and silence on such an occasion, and among so many members who belonged to the part of the Nation, which called for explanatory and restrictive amendments, and who had been elected as known advocates for them, cannot be accounted for without supposing that the terms "common defense and general welfare", were not at that time deemed susceptible of any such construction as has since been applied to them.

It may be thought perhaps, due to the subject, to advert to a letter of October 5, 1787, to Samuel Adams and another of October 16 of the same year to the Governor of Virginia, from R. H. Lee, in both which, it is seen that the terms had attracted his notice, and were apprehended by him "to submit to Congress every object of human legislation." But it is particularly worthy of remark, that although a Member of the Senate of the United States, when amendments to the Constitution were before that House, and sundry additions and alterations were there made to the list sent from the other, no notice was taken of those terms as pregnant with danger. It must be inferred that the opinion formed by the distinguished Member at the first view of the Constitution, and before it had been fully discussed and elucidated, had been changed into a conviction that the terms did not fairly admit the construction he had originally put on them, and therefore needed no explanatory precaution against it * * *.

Thomas Jefferson, on February 15, 1791, in his opinion on the power of Congress to establish the Bank of the United States (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson—Memorial edition, vol. III, pp. 147–149), said:

To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, that is to say, "to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare." For the laying of taxes is the power, and the general welfare the purpose, for which the power is to be exercised. Congress are not to lay taxes ad libitum, for any purpose they please, but only to pay the debts, or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. To consider the latter phrase not as describing the purpose of the first but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please, which might be for the good of the Union, would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless.

It would reduce the whole instrument to a single phrase, that of instituting a Congress with power to do whatever would be for the good of the United States, and as they would be the sole judges of the good or evil, it would also be a power to do whatever evil they pleased.

It is an established rule of construction, where a phrase will bear either of two meanings, to give it that which will allow some meaning to the other parts of the instrument, and not that which will render all the others useless. Certainly no such universal power was meant to be given them. It was intended to lace them up strictly within the enumerated powers, and those without which, as means, these powers could not be carried into effect. It is known that the very power now proposed as a means was rejected as an end by the Convention which formed the Constitution. * * *

Jefferson, in a letter dated September 7, 1803, to Wilson C. Nichols (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, memorial edition, vol. X, pp. 418–419), said:

* * * When an instrument admits two constructions, the one safe, the other dangerous, the one precise, the other indefinite, I prefer that which is safe and precise. I had rather ask an enlargement of power from the Nation, where it is found necessary, than to assume it by a construction which would make our powers boundless. Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction. * * *

Jefferson, in a letter dated June 16, 1817, to Albert Gallatin (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, memorial edition, vol. XV, pp. 133–134), said:

You will have learned that an act for internal improvement, after passing both Houses, was negatived by the President. The act was founded, avowedly, on the principle that the phrase in the Constitution which authorizes Congress "to lay taxes, to pay the debts, and provide for the general welfare" was an extension of the powers specifically enumerated to whatever would promote the general welfare; and this, you know, was the Federal doctrine. Whereas our tenet ever was, and, indeed, it is almost the only landmark which now divides the Federalists from the Republicans, that Congress had not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but more restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers, so it could not have been meant they should raise money for purposes which the enumeration did not place under their action; consequently, that the specification of powers is a limitation of the purposes for which they may raise money. * * *

Jefferson, in a letter dated December 26, 1825, to William B. Giles (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, memorial edition, vol. XVI, pp. 146–147), said:

* * * I see, as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the Federal branch of our Government is advancing toward the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic; and that, too, by constructions which, if legitimate, leave no limits to their power. Take together the decisions of the Federal Court, the doctrines of the President, and the misconstructions of the constitutional compact acted on by the Legislature of the Federal branch, and it is but too evident that the three ruling branches of that department are in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all functions, foreign and domestic. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry—and that, too, the most depressed—and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all. Under the authority to establish post roads, they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads, or digging canals, and, aided by a little sophistry on the words "general welfare", a right to do not only the acts to affect that which are specifically enumerated and permitted, but whatsoever they shall think or pretend will be for the general welfare. And what is our resource for the preservation of the Constitution? Reasons and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them. The representatives chosen by ourselves? They are joined in the combination, some from incorrect views of government, some from corrupt ones, sufficient voting together to outnumber the sound parts; and, with majorities only of one, two, or three, bold enough to go forward in defiance. * * *

Hamilton, in the Constitutional Convention, advocated, contrary to the overwhelming majority of its members, great centralization of power and a form of government which would have practically abolished the States (Elliott's Debates on the Federal Constitution, vol. V, 199, 202, 212).

James Monroe, in his message in 1822 vetoing an act of Congress for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland Road (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, Richardson, vol. II, pp. 163, 167, 173), said:

> • • • A power to provide for the common defense would give to Congress the command of the whole force and of all the resources of the Union; but a right to provide for the general welfare would go much further. It would, in effect, break down all the barriers between the States and the general Government and consolidate the whole under the latter.
> • • • My idea is that Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense and of general, not local, National, not State, benefit.
> • • • Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the money to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited Government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. Other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them. Each government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted and confine itself to those purposes • • •.

Andrew Jackson, a Democratic President, in a message to Congress in 1830 (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, Richardson, vol. II, pp. 483, 487, 491), vetoing a bill for subscribing to stock in the Maysville Road Turn Pike Co., regretted the precedents for appropriations of money under the Hamilton theory of the welfare clause, deeming them—

> • • • an admonitory proof of the force of implication and the necessity of guarding the Constitution with sleepless vigilance against the authority of precedents which have not the sanction of its most plainly defined powers; • • •.

> This subject has been one of much, and I may add, painful, reflection to me. It has bearings that are well calculated to exert a powerful influence upon our hitherto prosperous system of government, and which, on some accounts, may even excite despondency in the breast of an American citizen. I will not detain you with professions of zeal in the cause of internal improvements. If to be their friend is a virtue which deserves commendation, our country is blessed with an abundance of it, for I do not suppose there is an intelligent citizen who does not wish to see them flourish. But though all are their friends, but few, I trust, are unmindful of the means by which they should be promoted; none certainly are so degenerate as to desire their success at the cost of that sacred instrument with the preservation of which is indissolubly bound our country's hopes. If different impressions are entertained in any quarter, if it is expected that the people of this country, reckless of their constitutional obligations, will prefer their local interest to the principles of the Union, such expectations will in the end be disappointed; or if it be not so, then, indeed, has the world but little to hope from the example of free government. When an honest observance of constitutional compacts cannot be obtained from communities like ours, it need not be anticipated elsewhere, and the cause in which there has been so much martyrdom, and from which so much was expected by the friends of liberty, may be abandoned, and the degrading truth that man is unfit for self-government admitted. And this will be the case if expediency be made a rule of construction in interpreting the Constitution. Power in no government could desire a better shield for the insidious advances which it is ever ready to make upon the checks that are designed to restrain its action.

John C. Calhoun, an ardent supporter of the Madison and Jefferson theory, in 1851, said (Works of John C. Calhoun, vol. 1, pp. 358–359, 365–367):

> The report of Mr. Madison and the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions constituted the political creed of the State rights Republican Party. They were understood as being in full accord with Mr. Jefferson's opinion, who was its acknowledged head. They made a plain and direct issue with the principles and policy maintained by General Hamilton, who, although not nominally the head of the Federal Party, as they called themselves, was its soul and spirit. The ensuing Presidential election was contested on this issue and terminated in the defeat of Mr. Adams, the election of Mr. Jefferson as President, and the elevation of the Republican Party into power. To the principles and doctrine, so plainly and ably set forth in their creed, they owed their elevation and the long retention of power under many and severe trials. They secured the confidence of the people, because they were in accord with what they believed to be the true character of the Constitution and of our Federal system of government.

Mr. President, there manifestly was a limitation upon the theory of those who advocated what is commonly called the Hamiltonian doctrine, because they all limited the application of the doctrine to the money power, the power to tax for purposes which led to the common defense and which inured to the general welfare. The modern theory, however, seems to be if the object, in the judgment of Congress, is for the common welfare, it may be done without any reference whatsoever to the taxing power of the Congress. We apparently are departing from and going far beyond either the Madisonian theory or the Hamiltonian theory of the general-welfare clause and of the power of the Congress of the United States.

It will be observed that there is conflict in the opinions and views, hereinbefore quoted, in the construction and interpretation of the phrase "to lay and collect taxes • • • and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States", as used in the Constitution.

Madison and Jefferson took the view that the phrase does not confer broad and unlimited powers on Congress to tax and appropriate money for any and all purposes which Congress may deem or pretend to be for the general welfare of the United States, but, on the contrary, that they are limited and confined to legislation dealing with such objects and purposes as are authorized by the subjoined enumerated powers, or which may be reasonably implied therefrom, conferred in article I, section 8.

The views of Jackson, Polk, Calhoun, and Cleveland appear to be in harmony with the views of Madison and Jefferson.

Hamilton, on the other hand, took a broader view as to the powers conferred. His view was that the power of Congress to tax and appropriate money for the common defense and general welfare was not confined and limited to objects and purposes authorized by the subjoined enumerated powers in article I, section 8, but that Congress had a discretionary power to tax and appropriate money for such objects and purposes as Congress might deem essential for the general welfare, provided the expenditures were made generally throughout the Union, and not locally or confined to a particular spot.

Monroe appears to have adopted the Hamilton theory. However, Monroe expressed the view that Congress did not have the power to raise and appropriate money "to any and to every purpose according to their will and pleasure", pointing out that "the Government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only", and that "other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them."

Mr. Justice Story's views (supra, pp. 23–24) appear to be in accord with those of Hamilton and Monroe.

It should be pointed out that neither Hamilton, Monroe, nor Mr. Justice Story went so far as to take the view that Congress had the power to enact any legislation for the general welfare, separate and independent of the taxing power.

But Monroe, as I have undertaken to point out, accepted a limitation upon the Hamiltonian theory, the power to act in behalf of the general welfare being limited in the view of them all to the legitimate exercise of the taxing power of the Government.

In construing and interpreting the phrase in question, it is important to consider its history in the Federal convention. When the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" are discussed, at least in recent years, the impression is conveyed that their meaning and intent were as carefully considered and discussed by the members of the Federal Convention as were other provisions of the Constitution. However, according to Madison, that is not the fact.

I have already quoted his letter to Stevenson, in which he points out that the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" appear, outside of the preamble, in just one place in the Constitution.

Great weight should be given to Madison's explanation of the use of the phrase in drafts and revisions of the form of a constitution. He was one of the most active members of the Convention, and has been frequently referred to as the father of the Constitution.

In his letter to Stevenson—already quoted—Madison not only expresses his opinion concerning the construction and interpretation of the terms "common defense" and "general welfare", but he also states very clearly their history during the proceedings of the Convention. I have hereinbefore stated that I have been unable to find in the records of the Convention any debates or discussions whatever concerning the above terms, and that there were no such debates or discussions is confirmed by Madison's letter to Stevenson.

The terms "common defense" and "general welfare" appeared in article VIII of the Articles of Confederation, as follows:

All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, * * *.

The foregoing clearly implies, by the use of the word "other", that the charges of war were considered as expenses for the common defense or general welfare, as well as all other charges incurred for the maintenance of the Government.

Madison states that the words "common defense" and "general welfare" appeared in the general propositions relative to a constitution offered to the Federal Convention on May 29, 1787, as a basis for deliberations. The language there used was—

Resolved, That the Articles of the Confederation ought to be so corrected and enlarged as to accomplish the objects proposed by their institution, namely, common defense, security of liberty, and general welfare.

And on the following day the proposition was exchanged for a resolution which read:

That an union of the States merely federal will not accomplish the objects proposed by the Articles of Confederation; namely, common defense, security of liberty, and general welfare.

In that connection, Madison says (supra, p. 10):

The inference from the use here made of the terms, and from the proceedings on the subsequent propositions is, that although common defense and general welfare were objects of the confederation, they were limited objects, which ought to be enlarged by the enlargement of the particular powers to which they were limited—and to be accomplished by a change in the structure of the Union from a form merely federal to one partly national, and as these general terms are prefixed in the like relation to the several legislative powers in the new charter, as they were in the old, they must be understood to be under like limitations in the new as in the old.

From May 30 up to August 21, 1787, the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" were evidently dropped. On the latter date they again appeared, as follows:

The legislature of the United States shall have power to fulfill the engagements which have been entered into by Congress, and to discharge as well the debts of the United States as the debts incurred by the several States, during the late war, for the common defense and general welfare.

Madison then says:

On the 22d of August, the committee of five reported among other additions to the clause giving power "to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and excises", a clause in the words following "for payment of the debts and necessary expenses", with a proviso qualifying the duration of revenue laws.

This report being taken up, it was moved, as an amendment, that the clause should read "the legislature shall fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States."

It was then moved to strike out "discharge the debts" and insert "liquidate the claims", which being rejected, the amendment was agreed to as proposed, viz, "the legislature shall fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States."

On the 23d of August the clause was made to read "the legislature shall fulfill the engagements and discharge the debts of the United States, and shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises", the two powers relating to taxes and debts being merely transposed.

On the 25th of August, the clause was again altered so as to read "all debts contracted and engagements entered into by or under the authority of Congress (the Revolutionary Congress) shall be as valid under this Constitution as under the confederation."

This amendment was followed by a proposition, referred to the powers to lay and collect taxes, etc., and to discharge the debts (old debts) to add "for payment of said debts, and for defraying the expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense and general welfare." The proposition was disagreed to, one State only voting for it.

September 4: The committee of eleven reported the following modification: "The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare"; thus retaining the terms of the Articles of Confederation, and covering by the general term "debts" those of the old Congress.

Madison then takes up the construction and interpretation of the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" as they appear in article I, section 8, of the Constitution. His construction and interpretation is enlightening and deserves careful consideration. His conclusion is:

* * * that in the multitude of motions, propositions, and amendments there is not a single one having reference to the terms "common defense and general welfare" unless we were so to understand the proposition containing them, made on August 25, which was disagreed to by all the States except one.

* * * that these terms copied from the Articles of Confederation were regarded in the new as in the old instrument merely as general terms, explained and limited by the subjoined specifications; and therefore requiring no critical attention or studied precaution.

And again:

That the terms in question were not suspected, in the convention which formed the Constitution of any such meaning as has been constructively applied to them may be pronounced with entire confidence. For it exceeds the possibility of belief, that the known advocates in the convention for a jealous grant and cautious definition of Federal powers, should have silently permitted the introduction of words or phrases in a sense rendering fruitless the restrictions and definitions elaborated by them.

Consider for a moment the immeasurable difference between the Constitution limited in its powers to the enumerated objects and expanded as it would be by the import claimed for the phraseology in question. The difference is equivalent to two Constitutions, of characters essentially contrasted with each other, the one possessing powers confined to certain specified cases; the other extending to all cases whatsoever: For what is the case that would not be embraced by a general power to raise money, a power to provide for the general welfare, and a power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry these powers into execution; all such provisions and laws superseding, at the same time, all local laws and constitutions at variance with them. Can less be said with the evidence before us furnished by the journal of the Convention itself, than that it is impossible that such a Constitution as the latter would have been recommended to the States by all the members of that body whose names were subscribed to the instrument.

Passing from this view of the sense in which the terms common defense and general welfare were used by the framers of the Constitution, let us look for that in which they must have been understood by the conventions, or rather by the people who through their conventions accepted and ratified it. And here the evidence is, if possible, still more irresistible that the terms could not have been regarded as giving a scope to Federal legislation, infinitely more objectionable, than any of the specified powers which produced such a strenuous opposition, and calls for amendments which might be safeguards against the dangers apprehended from them.

As Madison says, if the members of the Constitutional Convention had any thought of conferring broad and unlimited powers on Congress to tax and appropriate money for any objects or purposes which Congress might deem or pretend to be for the general welfare, it is inconceivable that they would have granted such broad and unlimited powers without any debate or discussion whatever, especially in view of the fact that the debates in the Convention are replete with discussions and arguments concerning the limitation of the powers which they intended to confer on the Federal Government. According to the records of the Constitutional Convention, the matter foremost in the minds of the majority of its members was to create a Federal Government with limited powers, and to define, as far as possible, the powers conferred on the Federal Government, reserving all others to the States or to the people.

Furthermore, any legislation enacted by Congress necessarily has to do with the common defense and/or general welfare of the United States, and it will readily be observed that every one of the subjoined enumerated powers conferred by article I, section 8, relate either to the common defense or general welfare, or both. To take the view that the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" confer on Congress broad and unlimited powers to tax and appropriate money for any objects or purposes which Congress may deem or pretend to be for the general welfare, regardless of whether such objects or purposes have any relation to the subjoined enumerated powers conferred, is to impute to the framers of the Constitution the deliberate insertion of clearly unnecessary provisions. If they intended by the general clauses to confer broad and unlimited powers, in no way qualified or limited by the subjoined enumerated powers, then the latter are mere tautology, because all of the subjoined enumerated powers would have been conferred under the terms "common defense" and "general welfare."

Furthermore, if the framers intended by the terms "common defense" and "general welfare" to confer broad and unlimited powers on Congress to enact legislation for any objects or purposes which Congress might deem or pretend to be for the common defense and general welfare, there was no necessity for the insertion of article X in the Bill of Rights, which provides—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people—for the reason that no powers would have been reserved to the States or to the people.

Again, it will be noted that in article I, section 8, after granting the power to tax "and provide for the common defense and general welfare", 17 other enumerated powers are conferred on Congress (supra, pp. 4–5), beginning with the one "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." If it had been the intent of the framers of the Constitution to confer on Congress broad and unlimited powers to tax and provide for the common defense and general welfare, there would have been no necessity whatever for any of the 17 subjoined enumerated powers conferred in that article and section, with the possible exception of the last, which confers on Congress power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

The imposition by Congress of taxes on all citizens of the United States, and the appropriation of the moneys thus realized for the benefit of certain groups of citizens, or certain States, or certain localities, as has been done in the past few years, is a power which Congress, we respectfully submit, has assumed to exercise without any authority therefor in the Constitution. Nor has Congress stopped there, but it has gone farther, and has enacted legislation imposing taxes on certain groups of citizens and has appropriated the money derived from such taxation for the benefit of certain other groups of citizens, and has declared the policy that such taxation and appropriation of moneys is essential for the general welfare of the United States. In other words, as stated by President Cleveland, instead of the people supporting the Government, the Government is supporting the people.

The more thought and consideration I have given to the construction and interpretation of the "common defense" and "general welfare" clauses, as expounded by Madison, Jefferson, and others, viz, that the power—is confined to the subjoined enumerated powers conferred in article I, section 8, the more I am convinced of the soundness of their construction and interpretation. To ignore their theory, and to construe and interpret the phrase to mean that Congress has the power to tax and provide for the "common defense" and "general welfare" so long as the appropriation is for the general, not local, benefit of the people, is to take the view that Congress has the power to invade the rights reserved to the States, and assume control over, if Congress sees fit, whatever in the judgment of Congress would promote the general welfare.

> To tax * * * and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—

As I understand it, the contention of the President and other administration spokesmen, is that Congress not only has the power to tax and appropriate money for the common defense and general welfare but that independent of the taxing power and the appropriation of moneys for such purposes, Congress also has the power to enact legislation for the general welfare, without regard to the subjoined enumerated powers conferred on Congress in article I, section 8, or any other specific power conferred. In other words, it is their contention that to provide for the "general welfare" constitutes a power in and of itself and is not limited or qualified by the taxing power or by any of the subjoined enumerated powers. If the framers of the Constitution had any such intention, which the records of the Federal Convention would seem to refute, then they did not create a government of limited powers but one of unlimited powers, for if Congress has the power to enact any legislation which it may deem necessary for the general welfare, it necessarily follows that its power is unlimited.

Madison made the point clear when he said:

> I, sir, have always conceived—I believe those who proposed the Constitution conceived, and it is still more fully known, and more material to observe that those who ratified the Constitution conceived—that this is not an indefinite Government, deriving its powers from the general terms prefixed to the specified powers, but a limited Government, tied down to the specified powers which explain and define the general terms. The gentlemen who contend for a contrary doctrine are surely not aware of the consequences which flow from it, and which they must either admit or give up their doctrine.
> It will follow, in the first place, that if the terms be taken in the broad sense they maintain, the particular powers afterward so carefully and distinctly enumerated would be without any meaning and must go for nothing. It would be absurd to say, first, that Congress may do what they please, and then that they may do this or that particular thing; after giving Congress power to raise money, and apply it to all purposes which they may pronounce necessary to the general welfare, it would be absurd, to say the least, to superadd a power to raise armies, to provide fleets, etc. In fact, the meaning of the general terms in question must either be sought in the subsequent enumeration which limits and details them, or they convert the Government from one limited, as hitherto supposed, to the enumerated powers, into a Government without any limits at all.
> * * * If Congress can apply money indefinitely to the general welfare, and are the sole and supreme judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may establish teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of the Public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may undertake the regulation of all roads, other than post roads. In short, everything, from the highest object of State legislation, down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress; for every object I have mentioned would admit the application of money, and might be called, if Congress pleased, provisions for the general welfare.

Jefferson said:

> * * * Under the authority to establish post roads they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads, of digging canals, and aided by a little sophistry on the words "general welfare", a right to do, not only the acts to affect that, which are specifically enumerated and permitted, but whatsoever they shall think or pretend will be for the general welfare. And what is our resource for the preservation of the Constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them. * * *

Consider also the following comments and warnings by Jefferson on the unconstitutional exercise of Federal legislative power:

> * * * Take together the decisions of the Federal court, the doctrines of the President, and the misconstructions of the constitutional compact acted on by the legislature of the Federal branch, and it is but too evident that the three ruling branches of that department are in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all functions, foreign and domestic. Under the power to regulate commerce they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufacturers, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry—and that, too, the most depressed—and put them into the pockets of the other—the most flourishing of all. * * *

And again, in a letter dated August 18, 1821, to Charles Hammond (The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, memorial edition, vol. XV, pp. 331–332)—

It has long, however, been my opinion, and I have never shrunk from its expression—although I do not choose to put it into a newspaper, nor, like a Priam in armor, offer myself its champion—that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of the Federal judiciary; an irresponsible body—for impeachment is scarcely a scarecrow—working like gravity by night and by day, gaining a little today and a little tomorrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief, over the field of jurisdiction, until all shall be usurped from the States and the government of all be consolidated into one. To this I am opposed, because when all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated. It will be as in Europe, where every man must either pike or gudgeon, hammer or anvil. Our functionaries and theirs are wares from the same workshop, made of the same materials and by the same hand. If the States look with apathy on this silent descent of their government into the gulf which is to swallow all, we have only to weep over the human character formed uncontrollable but by a rod of iron, and the blasphemers of man, as incapable of self-government, become his true historians.

In the Associated Press case, decided April 12, 1937, Mr. Justice Sutherland, writing the minority opinion, sounds the following timely and emphatic warning:

Do the people of this land, in the providence of God, favored, as they sometimes boast, above all others in the plentitude of their liberties desire to preserve those so carefully protected by the first amendment: Liberty of religious worship, freedom of speech and of the press, and the right as freemen peaceably to assemble and petition their Government for a redress of grievances? If so, let them withstand all beginnings of encroachment. For the saddest epitaph which can be carved in memory of a vanished liberty is that it was lost because its possessors failed to stretch forth a saving hand while yet there was time.

If the Supreme Court should ever be so constituted that the majority of its members would construe and interpret the phrase "To lay and collect taxes * * * and provide for the * * * general welfare of the United States" as conferring on Congress broad and unlimited discretionary power (1) to impose taxes and appropriate money for the general welfare of the United States, or (2) that Congress has the power to enact legislation providing for the general welfare of the United States, separate and independent of the taxing power, and that such powers are not qualified or limited by the subjoined enumerated powers conferred by the Constitution, then the powers of the Federal Government would be unlimited, and Congress could enact any legislation which it might deem or pretend to be for the general welfare of the United States. In other words, as stated by Madison, it would be a "government without any limits at all", and Congress would have the power to enact legislation concerning "everything, from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the joint resolution has expired.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I inquire what is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The parliamentary situation is that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has offered an amendment to the committee amendment on page 5, line 5, to strike out the words "not exceeding $100,000,000 of" and to begin the word "this", in line 6, with a capital letter. That is the pending question.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in view of the discussion of the administrative cost of the Resettlement Administration, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement headed "Statement relative to administrative funds", which appears on page 306 of the hearings before the Senate committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT RELATIVE TO ADMINISTRATIVE FUNDS

By the end of the current fiscal year approximately $150,000,000 will have been advanced in the form of rehabilitation loans to assist some 475,000 destitute or low-income farm families to become self-supporting. The cost of furnishing supervision and guidance to these families during the current fiscal year will amount to approximately $9,850,000 and general administration and overhead will amount to approximately $7,050,000. Excluding consideration of the fact that included in these sums are the costs of administering a direct grant program involving over 450,000 farm families who will have received during the current fiscal year an aggregate of approximately $50,000,000, the average outlay during this year for supervision, guidance, and overhead for each farm family benefited by a loan will amount to approximately $35.50, of which $20.70 is for supervision, education, and guidance, and only $14.80 for general overhead. On the basis of experience it is conservatively estimated that at least 75 percent of the funds advanced during the year in the form of loans will eventually be recovered and returned to the Treasury. Thus, the ultimate net cost to the Government during the current year for each farm family who has received a loan will amount to less than $70. Not only is this the least expensive type of relief, being only a small fraction of the annual family cost of direct or work relief, but a farmer and his family will have been reestablished in his regular occupation in their own locality. Barring natural catastrophes such as flood or drought, this family's improved status will be permanent.

As previously indicated, the above analysis overstates the ultimate annual cost per family of carrying on a rehabilitation-loan program because included in the costs of supervision and overhead are the expenses of administering a program of direct grant relief, the nature of which is explained elsewhere in this record. If both loan and grant cases are considered, the average outlay during the year for supervision and overhead per family will amount to only $18.25. Making ample allowance for nonrecoverable expenditures for loans and grants, the total average cost per family will be less than $90. At this low ultimate annual family cost 925,000 farm families will have been aided by either a loan or by grants during the current fiscal year.

As pointed out by the Secretary, the supervision, guidance, and education given to rehabilitation clients is the factor which distinguishes this program from simple credit transactions and is as important to the rehabilitation process as the financial assistance afforded. Without such supervision the average amount of individual loans would be substantially larger and repayments, experience indicates, would be materially decreased. For these reasons the small annual family cost of supervision and guidance represents an investment which will be recovered many times over in a larger proportion of repayments, smaller initial outlays, and in a more rapid and permanent rehabilitation. It should be observed that the more efficient the supervision, the greater the relative cost appears to be because of the reduction in the amounts necessary to advance to clients. Without such guidance the sum of $75,000,000 would be wholly inadequate for the program during the next fiscal year.

Of the total $25,000,000 requested for the costs of administering the program during the next fiscal year, $15,000,000 will be utilized directly in connection with the rehabilitation program. Part of this amount would be necessary to continue supervision of and to service loans previously made and to cover the overhead expenses relative to making collections. The remainder will be necessary to carry on the proposed $75,000,000 loan and grant program. It is planned to convert grant relief cases into rehabilitation loan cases as rapidly as circumstances will permit, thus changing thousands of families from direct relief, a relatively expensive type of aid since such expenditures are permanently lost, to the less costly loan type of assistance where the larger portion of the original outlays will be recovered and the borrower assisted in becoming self-supporting. This conversion process, of course, will increase the amount of necessary supervision and will account for part of the $15,000,000 sum.

Of the $15,000,000 discussed above, almost $11,000,000 will be for personal services. The annual salaries of rural supervisors and assistant supervisors are so small that great difficulty is experienced in recruiting and retaining qualified agriculturally trained men. The estimated amount for this purpose will not permit a sufficient staff to visit each client as often as would be desirable and advantageous to do so, since each such employee will service and supervise an average of more than 150 clients. The traveling expenses of these employees will absorb approximately $3,000,000. These low-salaried employees are required to perform necessary travel in personally owned automobiles at mileage rates considerably below those permitted by law. The average monthly expenses of this type are approximately $50 per supervisor. An additional $1,000,000 will be required for office rents and maintenance, office supplies, miscellaneous items, and for the procurement of forms for applications, agreements, notes, chattel mortgages, and other documents required by Government regulations.

In addition to the direct costs of supervising and administering the rural rehabilitation program as explained above, the share of general administrative and staff services provided for administering the entire Resettlement Administration program would be approximately $2,000,000. This includes legal, financial, personnel administration, and other general staff and service expenses. In measuring the total cost of the rehabilitation program it must be emphasized that the best estimates possible at this time indicate that loan repayments during the next fiscal year will exceed $35,000,000 which will, of course, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Thus the anticipated net withdrawals from the Treasury will be reduced by at least 40 percent below the total sum requested for rehabilitation purposes.

Of the $25,000,000 administrative funds requested, it is estimated that, as heretofore, approximately $2,000,000 will be required to continue the farm debt adjustment program. This activity is financed entirely with administrative funds since the only expenditures incurred in carrying on this work are the salaries and expenses of Government employees and the funds advanced for actual expenses of voluntary local debt adjustment committees. Because of the very nature of this particular phase of the rehabilitation program administrative expenses cannot be other than 100 percent of the total cost of this activity. The testimony and statistics submitted for this record show that the need for this type of activity is not likely to diminish during the next fiscal year. As a result of this work the size of loans required for rehabilitating farm families has been greatly reduced. More than $47,000,000 have been saved farmers by this program of reducing debts but the entire cost must be financed from funds provided for administrative purposes.

The remainder of $6,000,000 from the proposed $25,000,000 fund will be required to administer the final acquisition of submarginal lands for which contracts of purchase have already been entered into, the administration of and completion of rural and suburban projects, and the development of submarginal land. Projects now under way will be completed with funds already encumbered or with funds made available from previous appropriations provided such funds are reappropriated. The expenditure of $25,000,000 in completing the rural and suburban projects now under way will be involved. The administrative expenses incident to this work must be met from the $6,000,000 referred to above. It must be emphasized that the total investment in permanent or recoverable assets, in addition to the $150,000,000 in outstanding loans, will approximate $190,000,000 by the end of the current fiscal year. The responsibility of managing, protecting, and administering these assets will require part of the $6,000,000 discussed above. Allowing 2½ percent for this purpose, only $1,250,000, or 5 percent, will be available for administering the completion of the land acquisition and project programs now under way.

It should be noted that during the fiscal year 1936 almost $33,000,000 was encumbered from administrative funds. In contrast, only $25,000,000 is requested for the next fiscal year. In May 1936 the Washington administrative and rehabilitation staff consisted of 3,662 employees. At present there are only 1,967 administrative and rehabilitation employees in the Washington offices, a reduction of 46 percent having been accomplished. In the field the present administrative and rehabilitation staff consists of approximately 11,900 employees. This represents a reduction from approximately 13,500 persons employed in the field a year ago. The proposed fund of $25,000,000 would require reducing the Washington administrative and rehabilitation staff to 1,700 employees and the field administrative and rehabilitation staff to 10,500 employees.

Since the hearings held by this committee in January on the First Deficiency Appropriation Act of 1937, the Washington staff has been reduced from 2,778 to 1,967 employees, which has effected a saving of $1,378,000 in aggregate annual salaries. The average Washington and field salaries now paid are believed to be lower than the average salaries of any emergency agency, being $1,924 in Washington, and $1,450 in the field.

Of the total $25,000,000 fund, it is estimated that approximately $21,000,000 will be spent in the field and only $4,000,000 will be spent in Washington.

Additional facts relative to administrative funds appear in the hearings of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, on pages 44–48.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 9, after the word "determine", it is proposed to insert "including such cost of administration as the President may direct."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is line 8 a part of the committee amendment just adopted or is that a part of the original text of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a part of the original text.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is not, then, as I understand, open to amendment at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not open to amendment as yet. It will be later. There is an amendment pending, however, which has just been stated, on page 5, line 9, to insert the words "including such cost of administration as the President may direct." The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 10, after the word "no", it is proposed to strike out—

Agricultural laborer and no unskilled laborer who refuses or has refused an offer of private employment paying as much or more in compensation for such work as such person has received or could receive under the relief herein provided and who is capable of performing such work shall be eligible for relief hereunder for the period such private employment or any similar subsequent offer of such employment would be available: And provided further, That any person who performs such private employment shall at the expiration thereof be entitled to an immediate resumption of his previously existing employment status on the work relief authorized by this act.

And insert:

Persons employed on work projects and certified as in need of relief who refuses a bona-fide offer of private employment under reasonable working conditions which pays as much or more in compensation as such person receives or could receive under this appropriation and who is capable of performing such work, shall be retained in employment under this appropriation for the period such private employment would be available: Provided further, That any person who takes such private employment shall at the expiration thereof be entitled to immediate resumption of his previous employment status under this appropriation if he is still in need of relief and if he has lost the private employment through no fault of his own.

So as to read:

Provided, That no person employed on work projects and certified as in need of relief who refuses a bona-fide offer of private employment under reasonable working conditions which pays as much or more in compensation as such person receives or could receive under this appropriation and who is capable of performing such work, shall be retained in employment under this appropriation for the period such private employment would be available: Provided further, That any person who takes such private employment shall at the expiration thereof be entitled to immediate resumption of his previous employment status under this appropriation if he is still in need of relief and if he has lost the private employment through no fault of his own.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have no criticism to make of this amendment, but there may be an ambiguity present which will affect the matter of construction. It will be noticed that the amendment reads—

Person employed on work projects and certified as in need of relief who refuses a bona-fide offer of private employment under reasonable working conditions which pays as much or more in compensation as such person receives or could receive under this appropriation.

I understand that in most cases relief workers get about 3 days of 8 hours work a week each, and I was wondering when they have an opportunity to work in private industry whether or not the word "compensation" might be interpreted as meaning compensation for a week. That would be very unfair to an individual who might be compelled in industry to work a whole week for the same wage that is received for only 3 days under the W. P. A. I was going to suggest, if I may, inserting after the word "compensation", the words "per hour."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the language stricken out was adopted on the floor of the House and applied only to agricultural unskilled labor. When Mr. Hopkins was before the committee he agreed that it should apply to all persons employed on work relief.

Mr. WAGNER. I am in sympathy with the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. The matter was taken up with his office and the language of the provision came from the Works Progress Administration.

Mr. WAGNER. Undoubtedly what is intended by the amendment is that the wage for work in private employment shall, in terms of hours, be not less than that received under the W. P. A. Suppose that for 3 days a W. P. A. worker received $12, or $4 a day—perhaps I am taking too large a figure—and he is offered a position in private industry; would he be required to work 8 hours a day and 6 days a week for the same compensation that was paid him for working 3 days a week for the W. P. A.?

Mr. HAYDEN. It seems to me the term "reasonable working conditions" takes care of that situation.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think so, with all due respect to the Senator. It is undoubtedly intended that he shall receive no less pay than under W. P. A. The insertion of the words "per hour" would, I think, bring about what is desired.

Mr. HAYDEN. My only thought is that, after all, this is very general language which must be interpreted by means of a regulation issued by the Works Progress Arministration.

Mr. WAGNER. Personally I do not want to leave it subject to the interpretation that a man could be asked to go into private industry and work 6 days a week, 8 hours a day, for the same compensation he is given for 3 days under W. P. A. That would be very unfair to the individual.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask my colleague a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. If there were inserted the language my colleague has suggested, a man might only have half a dozen hours per week, but at a higher rate per hour. Under the W. P. A. he might be getting 30 cents an hour, but he has 3 days' work per week. Under the plan suggested, if he had a higher rate per hour, that might mean he would only get 1 day's work per week.

Mr. WAGNER. On the contrary, if he was employed 2 days a week at 30 cents per hour he would have to work 42 hours per week for the same compensation which he received under W. P. A. for, say, 15 hours' work per week.

Mr. HAYDEN. It seems to me the Senator gives the provision very strained interpretation.

Mr. WAGNER. That may be; but why leave it open to question?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that if he is to receive the same rate of pay he must receive an equal rate of pay or something in excess.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, suppose a man works for W. P. A. 3 days a week and gets $10. If industry offers him $10 to work for a week, would he have to work for 6 days 8 hours a day for $10?

Mr. GEORGE. I should not think so. There is nothing in the amendment about days or hours or anything else, but it is merely provided that working conditions must be reasonable and pay must be the same or more.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; the compensation must be the same, but that may mean for the 3 days. I think the statement compensation "per hour" would qualify it properly.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that is what it means. I can see no possible ground upon which any other construction could be given to the language.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator knows that often we construe a provision in a certain way and then the courts construe it otherwise.

Mr. HAYDEN. The "court" in this case is the Works Progress administrator having charge of the project. A man takes private employment but gives it up to come back to the W. P. A. We put the burden upon the local administrator to determine whether or not the man has been offered, in private industry, a fair rate of compensation under reasonable working conditions.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think we ought to leave it to the interpretation of a local administrator, who might not be very much of an advocate of decent wages under W. P. A., to determine that what a man got under W. P. A. for 3 days he must work 6 days in private industry to earn.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator would not want to tie it right down so that if there was a difference of a cent or half a cent an hour and a man had a permanent job, the amendment would not apply? It seems to me when we use the word "compensation" it means what it honestly is intended to mean. Compensation may vary slightly per hour or per day; but the Senator wants to have workers employed by private industry.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course; but not by offering a rate of pay which is entirely inadequate for the services rendered. That would be very advantageous for some industries in some communities.

Mr. ADAMS. When it is provided that the administrator shall ascertain whether a worker is getting as much or more in compensation, it seems to me it is reasonably clear.

Mr. WAGNER. I may suggest to the Senator that I see no objection to making the provision very definite, because we have administrators in the country who have different views about these matters. I should not want to have any of them interpret this provision to mean that for 3 days' compensation for W. P. A. a man must work 6 days for private industry.

Mr. ADAMS. If a man has been working on W. P. A. 3 days, 7½ hours a day, and could get the same compensation in private employment by working 8 hours a day, there being only a half hour a day difference and permanent employment being involved, would the Senator want to say that such a man must be kept on W. P. A. and that he could not be allowed to take the private employment? There should be a reasonable interpretation, and I think the language is open to no other interpretation than that.

Mr. WAGNER. The wages paid by W. P. A. are very low and nothing like the prevailing wage. They are paying what they call a security wage. If we are merely going to give a man an opportunity to earn in private employment even less than he is being paid under the law, then we are opening the door to some very great difficulties.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the only difficulty is that the hourly rate of wage paid by W. P. A. is the prevailing wage. It seems to me it should be "per day" instead of "per hour." All measures relating to such matters have required that the wage paid be at the prevailing hourly rate, while the security wage, the total amount a man can receive for a month's work, is much less than a full month's work would be if he were working a full month at the prevailing wage, because we do not permit a man to work a full month for W. P. A.

Mr. WAGNER. My impression is that it ought to be the prevailing rate of wage, but the Senate does not agree with me as to that.

Mr. RUSSELL. The prevailing rate of wage is paid.

Mr. WAGNER. So far as hours are concerned.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. But the Senator thinks that if the prevailing rate per hour is paid by W. P. A., private industry ought not to be required to pay twice the prevailing wage.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not take that position at all. I was pointing out the position we would be in by inserting the words "per hour", because private industry does not employ people for 2 or 3 days a week. It usually employs them for a full week, and they work 5 days at least, and sometimes 5½ days. For that reason it occurred to me that it might be well to give some attention to the wording.

The Senator from New York knows there are two different scales of wages. One is the prevailing rate per hour; but the total amount that a man may receive for a month is based on the arbitrary figure that is fixed by the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration.

Mr. WAGNER. That is what accounts for employment only 3 days a week.

Mr. RUSSELL. Exactly.

Mr. WAGNER. I should not want to make it possible for private industry to get the services of these men at a very low wage.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator in charge of the joint resolution would consider an amendment on line 25, after the word "compensation", to insert "for approximately like hours of service."

The thought I have in mind is that on the basis of the hourly rate, the relief workers are working at the prevailing wage. In some localities they are permitted to work 90 hours during a month, and the greatest compensation they can get for the month's work is 90 hours multiplied by the rate per hour. If they are offered a position by the month, must they then accept the amount they would receive at the prevailing wage for 90 hours under the W. P. A.?

I was not thinking so much about the compensation they would get under the W. P. A.; but the thought which came to me is that if a man should be required to work a month for the amount he would receive for 90 hours' work at the prevailing wage under the W. P. A., then we would break down the wage generally prevailing in that locality for private employment; and I presume there are employers who would be perfectly willing to let their present employees go if they could go to the relief headquarters and say to someone equally competent to do the work, "I am going to offer you a monthly job at an amount of money which is as great as or greater than the amount you receive under the W. P. A."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that I cannot conceive of anybody interpreting the phrase, "which pays as much or more in compensation" in a way that would disregard the time element. In other words, if it were not for that element, an employer could say, "I am paying you $50", and in one case the $50 payment would be for a year, and in another case it would be for a week. The time element necessarily enters into every computation of compensation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New York on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 20 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. WAGNER. I will speak on the joint resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me suggest that if the words "for the same length of service" should be added after "compensation", I believe the object sought by everyone would be accomplished.

Mr. WAGNER. I will accept that amendment—"for the same length of service."

Mr. ADAMS. I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment. I think it is tautological, but I am perfectly willing to accept it.

Mr. WAGNER. I was fearful that what would happen, as was so well pointed out by the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ], was that in some areas there might be a break-down of the wage scale which the union of that particular locality had been fighting for years to attain. I am sure the Senator does not intend that to happen, and I think the amendment would obviate that possibility.

Mr. ADAMS. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the amendment which is finally suggested is that after the word "compensation", in the last line on page 5, the words "for the same length of service" be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the committee amendment is agreed to.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 6, line 10, after the word "funds", to strike out "allocated hereunder to the Works Progress Administration" and insert "herein appropriated", and in line 15, after the word "year", to strike out "through such agency", so as to make the paragraph read:

> The funds herein appropriated shall be so apportioned and distributed over the 12 months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and shall be so administered during such fiscal year, as to constitute the total amount that will be furnished during such fiscal year for relief purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 7, line 2, after the word "President", to insert:

> Provided further, That in the event the Congress or any Federal agency so authorized by act of Congress shall establish minimum rates of pay for persons employed by private employers in any occupation or occupations, thereafter no greater percentage differentials in the amount of compensation paid than the average minimum differentials established by the Congress or such Federal agency shall be applicable to persons engaged upon projects under the foregoing appropriations and in the event no differential be established there shall be no differential in compensation applicable to such persons.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer a modification of that amendment which has been worked out after a number of conferences.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the committee amendment on page 7 will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, lines 2 to 12, it is proposed to strike out the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee amendment and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

> Provided further, That in the event the Congress or any Federal agency so authorized by act of Congress shall establish minimum rates of pay for persons employed by private employers in any occupation or occupations and shall establish differentials applicable to different localities or sections of the country in such rates of pay, thereafter no greater percentage differentials shall be applicable to the compensation of persons engaged upon projects under the foregoing appropriation than the average differentials so established by the Congress or such Federal agency and in the event the Congress or such Federal agency shall establish such minimum rates of pay without any differential applicable to different localities or sections of the country there shall be no such differential in compensation applicable to persons engaged on projects under the foregoing appropriation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, frankly I could not keep my mind operating sufficiently fast to understand just what this amendment is about.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the language of the amendment may sound somewhat involved, but really the purpose that the words accomplish is very simple. The amendment merely provides that when and if the Congress enacts legislation dealing with hours and wages there shall be no greater differential in the payments to those employed on W. P. A. projects in the several sections of the country than is established or allowed by the Congress or by any body or commission which may be established by Congress to prescribe rates of wages and hours of employment in private industry.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator explain the difference between his proposal and that contained in the joint resolution as it stands?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is very slight. I may say to the Senator from Oregon that the amendment has been printed, and doubtless a printed copy of it is on the Senator's desk. It was printed several days ago. It merely provides that if Congress shall establish minimum rates of pay and shall establish differentials applicable to different localities or sections of the country—that is the chief change in the amendment as adopted by the committee—then there shall be no greater average differential in the compensation that is paid by the Works Progress Administration than might be established by Congress or by some commission or organization authorized by Congress to deal with the subject.

It strikes me that the inherent fairness of this proposal will be very readily evident to any Senator. At the present time the Works Progress Administration is paying the prevailing wage for hours of employment, but the total number of hours that persons engaged on prjects may work, and the total amount of monthly compensation that they may receive have been arbitrarily fixed by the Works Progress Administration. What I say is not critical of the gentlemen who have discharged the enormous responsibility of administering these countless projects and dealing with all the various problems that have arisen all over the country in connection with them; but the fact remains that the wage scale for the same type of work has run from $19 a month in some sections of the country to $60.50 a month in other sections of the country, and Mr. Hopkins very frankly told the committee that those wages were not based upon differences in cost of living, but were based upon differences in living standards. I say it is un-American for the Government of the United States, taking funds from the common Treasury, to freeze certain classes of unfortunates in one section of the Nation at a lower standard of living, or to recognize it in expending funds from the Federal Treasury.

The amendment may sound involved; but the purpose it seeks is fair and is very simple, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. ADAMS. In the earlier part of the Senator's amendment he provides that if by act of Congress there shall be established "minimum rates of pay for persons employed by private employers in any occupation or occupations." As I read it, if for instance the rate were established in one occupation, then that rate, under the Senator's amendment, must apply to other occupations which were not under consideration.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all. If the Senator will read the remainder of the amendment he will find it refers to occupations, and then the payments under the Works Progress Administration are to be based on the percentage of all of the differentials which might be established in all of the various occupations.

Mr. ADAMS. But my point is that there may be two occupations, for instance, in New York City, the pay of one of which, by reason of a shortage of labor, is high, and the other may be low. Yet in Birmingham the supply of labor is reversed. In other words, you might establish a differential in New York based on local conditions, and that would compel the application of the rate not only to that particular occupation but they might go to Chicago and establish it as to all other occupations. They might establish wages as to coal heavers in the Pennsylvania district, and that would apply to bakers in Seattle and other places. The Senator has not limited it to occupations.

Mr. RUSSELL. By chance it might be that the same scale fixed for coal heavers might apply to bakers in other sections of the country, but the amendment clearly provides it shall be based upon the average differential. I do not assume, as the Senator from Colorado imagines, or suggests, that the Congress, or any body established by Congress to deal with this subject, is likely to confine itself to any one occupation in fixing wages. It would be absolutely absurd to believe that Congress would pass a bill relating to coal heavers or bakers alone. The wage would apply to all occupations throughout the entire length of the land.

The Works Progress Administration will work out the average differential as between all of these occupations in the different sections of the country, and if there were such a differential no greater differential should then be allowed to exist in the security wage. If no differential be established whatever, then there would be no difference in the security wage in any section of the country.

Mr. ADAMS. I am frank to say that I am still apprehensive that we might strike a place in the Midwest where there was a very wide differential, but they would apply the same wage differential to some place else where there was not the justification for the wide differential. I do not think the establishment of a differential in one industry should govern the differential in every other industry. It might work decidedly to the disadvantage of those to whom it was being applied.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the so-called security wages which have been fixed for the various sections of the country.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Schedule of monthy earnings established by Executive order

Wage-rate region [1]	Counties in which the 1930 population of the largest municipality was [2]—

[2] For convenience these groups of counties are usually referred to as urbanization groups (A), (B), (C), (D), and (E) as indicated in the column headings.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I might say to the Senator from Colorado that, without regard to the differentials which have been fixed, I do not apprehend that Congress or any body dealing with the subject will find a differential in compensation of 300 percent as between men doing the same type of work in different sections of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed on page 16, line 21, to strike out the numerals "16" and insert "14", and to strike out the word "This" and insert "Title I of this", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. Title I of this joint resolution may be cited as the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1937.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill for a moment, I should like to say that I made a feeble effort in the committee to have a change made at the bottom of page 8, in the provision relating to aliens. I know an amendment to the language at this place is not in order at this time, but I should like to call attention to it.

The language in the bill as presented is different from the language in the old bill, where aliens illegally within the limits of the United States were prohibited from work. This goes much further. It provides that no aliens who have not, prior to the enactment of this joint resolution, filed a declaration of intention to become citizens, may have relief.

There are a great many aliens in the United States who are here legally, who are married to American women, and who have children who are American children. I fully agree that aliens who are here illegally should not be employed, but I think that aliens who are heads of families and who are here legally, but who have not yet declared their intention to become citizens, ought not to be denied the privileges of the measure.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from South Carolina to reply to the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in considering the section to which the Senator from New York calls attention, the committee had in mind the fact that last year the Senate adopted practically the language contained in the measure now presented to the Senate. In conference there was a change. The fact is that there are 120,000 aliens employed on W. P. A. projects. The cost per man is $800 a year. Therefore it amounts to $96,000,000.

In adopting this language the committee had in mind the statement of Mr. Hopkins that, according to his estimate, he would have to make a reduction in the number of people who could work upon W. P. A. projects. If he is correct, and there must be a reduction of 400,000, the question is whether or not that reduction should take place among American citizens or among aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens.

Under the language all that an alien has to do to be eligible is to file his declaration of intention to become a citizen. The Senator from New York is more familiar with the law than am I in that respect, and he has always been interested in the subject.

Mr. COPELAND. But it says "prior to the enactment of this joint resolution."

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, because I know the Senator from New York has in the committee always evidenced an interest in this subject, I may say that he has spoken to me about the matter on one or two occasions in the last few days, and that the committee has no desire to do any injustice to anyone. The amendment which has been adopted must go to conference. Certainly, the committee will be glad to give cosideration to the views expressed by the Senator from New York, who has evidenced such a great interest in this matter.

The only object the committee determined to endeavor to accomplish was this: If there is to be a reduction in the number of those employed on W. P. A. projects, the reduction should first take place among those who are not citizens of the United States and who have never evidenced a desire to become citizens of the United States rather than to have a citizen dismissed from a job.

I think I speak the view of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], in charge of the joint resolution, when I say that we shall be delighted to confer with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and, if possible, to compromise the differences so that no injustice will be done to the Senators interested.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from South Carolina. I know his humane instincts. I desire to make it clear for the RECORD that, of course, I have no objection to keeping relief from those who are illegally in this country, provided they are here not only illegally but improperly in every sense. However, there are aliens in the country who are here legally but who, for one reason or another, are not eligible for citizenship. Perhaps they cannot find the record of their admission to the country. There are many technical reasons why they are not eligible for citizenship. The group I have in mind are aliens who are married to American women and who have children who under our laws are American citizens.

With the statement on the part of the Senator from South Carolina, I am satisfied to leave the matter as it is, hoping that in the conference, where the whole subject will be open, some provision will be worked out which will do justice to these people; for out of a study of 4,000 aliens in this country, heads of families, it was found that there was an average of three Americans in the family—a wife and two children. So, of course, we would not wish to deny aid to those American women and those American children by reason of the fact that the father had not yet declared his intention to become a citizen and taken out his first papers.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, on page 14, near the top of the page, is an amendment which according to my information has been agreed to. I should like to ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and to ask the committee to recede from the amendment or ask the Senate to reject the amendment.

On page 14, in lines 1 to 3, the committee presented an amendment, following the date "1935", to strike out the words "or as may be necessary for administrative expenses of any agency heretofore established by the President under section 4 of said act."

The reference there is to the House Joint Resolution 117, approved April 8, 1935. Section 4 in that act is as follows:

> In carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution the President is authorized to establish and prescribe the duties and functions of necessary agencies within the Government.

Under that authority certain agencies were established, including the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration. Comparatively small portions of the fund appropriated in 1935 have been used in promoting necessary and very helpful prison reforms. The work has been under the study and advice of the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration, and the work is now progressing. There are a number of States—I believe there are 12—in which projects have been initiated, and some of them are approaching completion. Others are not so far advanced. There are some other States which under the amendment already agreed to in this joint resolution may have the opportunity of having the facilities improved with a view to promoting better prison conditions.

Having invited the establishment of these agencies, and these projects having been initiated under the authority of the act of 1935, and others being in contemplation, it occurs to me that it is not advisable to withhold all sums from the use of these agencies for administrative purposes.

The amount that would be required by the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration is very small. I cannot state the exact amount that would be required, but it is only a few thousand dollars, and the work that is being done is believed by those who have studied it to be of great value and usefulness.

I ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment referred to was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment on page 14, lines 1 to 3, was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, before action is taken on the amendment I desire to make an explanation as to why that provision was stricken out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I think it is an opportune time for the Senator to make his statement. I understand the vote by which the amendment was agreed to has been reconsidered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the committee amendment is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is now before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated all that seems appropriate to say in this immediate connection, and I yield the floor to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, in the effort which the Appropriations Committee made, somewhat unsuccessfully, to restrict the use of funds appropriated to relief purposes, and to study the extent to which relief funds had been devoted to other purposes, we found quite a number of agencies to which relief moneys had been allocated, very commendable agencies created for good purposes, but which in our judgment should have received their funds from appropriations from the Congress, and not from allocations from relief funds. Quite a number of these agencies were expending 100 percent of the moneys allocated to them for administrative purposes—and not one cent of the money which went to some of these agencies ever went to feed the hungry or clothe the naked. We did feel that if there were agencies to be established they should be established by Congress; that they should be financed through the regular courses of appropriation. We have made certain exceptions in a provision in the earlier part of the joint resolution to endeavor to carry out that suggestion. An amendment on page 3 was adopted, limiting the expense for administration purposes to 5 percent. It was felt that the average which Mr. Hopkins' organization had spent for administrative purposes of about 4 percent should be adequate for the administration of any agency which was spending relief moneys.

In this amendment on page 3 we make exception in the case of the General Accounting Office, the Treasury Department, the Employees' Compensation Commission, and the Resettlement Administration, because they were caring for primary and essential functions of relief.

For instance, the General Accounting Office was handling all the vouchers and the expenses, and necessarily they were going to consume all the money allocated to them; but when we came to the lines on page 14 which the Senator from Arkansas wishes to have reinstated, we concluded that language conflicted with the amendment which we had inserted on page 3 of the bill and was taking away the very thing we had sought to accomplish by giving to the Executive the power to allocate an unlimited amount of money to any agency for administrative purposes. It may be if the agency which the Senator from Arkansas has in mind ought to be excepted from the provisions, it ought to be excepted by name, and we should not make a general exception which may include a multitude of other agencies.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have in mind at this time no other agency than that to which I referred in the beginning; namely, the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration. Of course, that could be added to the exception set forth on page 3 by reconsidering that amendment and adding the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the Senator understands what we have in mind.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and I am in sympathy with requiring more definite appropriations where it is practicable to do so; but I made the point, and I think it is a fair one and one that ought to appeal to all Senators. In 1935 we expressly authorized the President to establish agencies for the purpose of carrying out the resolution. Manifestly those agencies cannot function without some arrangement for administrative expenses. The organization to which I have referred, according to every report that reaches me, has performed very useful services. If the Senator from Colorado would prefer to reconsider the amendment on page 3 in order to modify the exceptions, that would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. ADAMS. That would be my individual preference. As I understand the authority given the President in 1935 no longer exists. It seems to me, in view of that, they ought to come to Congress for their sustenance.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the statement of the Senator in charge of the bill I withdraw my opposition to the amendment on page 14, although I think there may be other agencies for which provision should be made, and I shall ask the Senate to recur to the committee amendment on page 3.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that does not dispose of the matter, does it?

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. McNARY. Had we not better dispose of it?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am going to dispose of it in another way. I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 3 of the joint resolution where there is a provision in the form of an exception that the provisions shall not apply to the General Accounting Office, and so forth, and if that request is granted, I shall move to insert in the committee amendment, in line 15, after the words "Resettlement Administration", the words "or to the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas to recur to the committee amendment on page 3?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Arkansas and the attention of the Senate to the fact that this agency does not now and never has performed any relief services of any kind or character. The authority by which the President established this agency has disappeared, I understand, so that the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Arkansas that the action of the Committee on Appropriations and the action of the Senate in approving the amendment of the committee be now rescinded, amounts to little more than an effort upon the part of the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration to secure the perpetuation of its life. It is not a relief agency.

The money which we are appropriating here is for the purpose of relief and work relief. The establishment of a Prison Industries Reorganization Administration has not a thing in the world to do with it. It is an institution which, in my judgment, should be brought into reexistence, so to speak, only by an act of Congress, only after consideration by some standing committee of this body, which should undertake to review the needs for such an organization and the need for the work which it proposes to do.

I venture to say there is not a Member of this body who can state to the Senate now what the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration actually does. I feel that the chairman of the Committee on Reorganization of the Government should actually be the last person to come here with a request to permit the establishment of an agency upon which Congress has never passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming object to the reconsideration of the committee amendment on page 3?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not object. I merely wanted to make a statement as to what the fact is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I cannot state all of the services that have been performed and are being performed by the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration, but it has been making studies of prison conditions in the various States in cooperation with the State authorities and State officials, and also studying conditions in Federal prisons and performing a very useful work. Many reforms have already been accomplished, and, as I have stated heretofore, numerous projects have been initiated. If we had not authorized the establishment of the agency, I should think the argument of the Senator from Wyoming would be persuasive, though not conclusive.

The Prison Industries Reorganization Administration makes these studies and furnishes the President with very helpful information. There is in the joint resolution, as Senators well know, a provision which contemplates the continuance of the work for a period of 1 year. In view of these circumstances, I feel justified in offering the amendment which I have offered, and I ask for a vote on my amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee on page 3, lines 6 to 17, was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 15, after the words "Commission", it is proposed to strike out "or to", and in the same line, after the words "Resettlement Administration", it is proposed to insert "and Prison Industries Reorganization Administration", so as to make the sentence read:

Except that this provision shall not apply to allocations made to the General Accounting Office, the Department of Justice, the Treasury Department, the Employees' Compensation Commission, the Resettlement Administration, or to the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration for administrative expenses in performing functions for or on behalf of the relief or work-relief program.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the committee amendment as amended is agreed to, I wish to offer another amendment to the committee amendment, and I hope the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] will accept it.

The Department of Commerce advise me that it will be impossible for them to function on 5 percent; and I ask to insert after the word "Department", in line 14 of the committee amendment, the words "the Department of Commerce."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee state why he wishes to make that very broad exception?

Mr. McKELLAR. Because, while I have not the figures before me, the Department of Commerce advise me that they cannot possibly do the work they are now doing on an administration cost of 5 percent.

Mr. ADAMS. The Department of Commerce are not operating under relief money, are they?

Mr. McKELLAR. They are in some instances. They have relief money, and they are performing certain relief functions, and the amendment will apply only to those functions under any circumstances.

I have not the exact figures, and for that reason I cannot give them. All I ask the Senator to do is to let the amendment be adopted and go to conference, with the understanding that if the Department of Commerce cannot show a good reason for it the amendment may be eliminated.

Mr. ADAMS. I think I can give the Senator some figures. I know he has in mind the fact that under the direction of the Bureau of Air Commerce they have had to do with the construction of airways and airfields where relief labor has been used. Eighty-seven million dollars has been expended on that work. The 5 percent which is authorized for administration under the joint resolution is nearly four and a half million dollars; and it seems to me four and a half million dollars ought to be adequate for the administrative purposes of the Department of Commerce, or whoever sees fit to do that work.

Mr. McKELLAR. On the Senator's statement I should think so, too. I entirely agree with him that that ought to be adequate. The only request I make is that the amendment may be adopted now and go to conference.

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator wants to tie the matter right down to the very agency that is doing the work, that is one thing; but to open it wide to the Department of Commerce is another.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I will put it in that form. Will the Senator give me the name of the agency? He is familiar with it, and I am not.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Bureau of Air Commerce.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator, furthermore, that out of relief money there has been turned over to the Bureau of Air Commerce $30,000 a month. As I say, that is out of relief money. The Bureau of Air Commerce is a bureau of the Department of Commerce. We have a regular appropriation bill appropriating very liberally for the Department of Commerce; and, as the Senator knows, we have been most generous in the matter of airways.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. ADAMS. We have raised the appropriations away beyond what they have ever been heretofore; and it does seem to me that we ought not to have to go into relief funds in order to obtain supervisory personnel to spend money for building airways. If the relief organization wants to take over these people, or to take other people, they do not need to be excepted, because they have an exemption of 5 percent, which will give them four and a half million dollars; and, as a matter of fact, they say they have been spending only $360,000.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. This is a Senate committee amendment. I think it was offered by the Senator from Tennessee in the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it was.

Mr. BYRNES. It will be in conference; and I suggest to the Senator that if the amendment is allowed to go to conference, and the Department of Commerce can make out a case, appropriate action can then be taken regarding the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly what I have asked, because I am inclined to think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] is right in his contention that 5 percent is ample; but if the Department officials have specific facts which show that it is not enough, I should like to have the matter in conference.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Tennessee will be on the conference committee, and he can present the matter to the conferees, and it can then be worked out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Even without putting in this language.

Mr. BYRNES. Because it is a Senate committee amendment, and the whole matter will be in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is true. If the Senator objects to the insertion of the words I have suggested, it will be all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that on page 14 the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] requested the reconsideration of an amendment, and later he withdrew his objection to it, so that amendment should be reinstated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment referred to by the Senator from Colorado will be agreed to.

The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "This" and insert "Title I of this", so as to read:

SEC. 14. Title I of this joint resolution may be cited as the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1937.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I rise not for the purpose of offering an amendment but for the purpose of asking the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] a question.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether or not the proviso on page 3, beginning in line 6, is an absolute restriction. Does it apply to all the money appropriated in the joint resolution, or just to this particular preceding appropriation?

Mr. ADAMS. I hope it applies to all of it.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I am asking.

Mr. ADAMS. I think it does; but I will say that if the terms "work" and "work relief" do not include all the activities which are enumerated in other parts of the joint resolution, there has been a wide departure from other measures, because the appropriation of $4,800,000,000 and the other measures have all been limited to work and work relief. This measure is a continuation of the old ones.

Mr. CONNALLY. I call the attention of the Senator, however, to a case that I fear will be cut off by this amendment.

In my State, under the prior acts, the President made allocations for the construction of a series of dams on the Colorado River.

By another of the prior acts that work was actually turned over to the Reclamation Bureau. One of those dams is about half completed; and I am afraid that under this language no more money could be allocated to that project, and the result would be to waste everything that has gone before.

Mr. ADAMS. Under the appropriation for work and work relief in some other acts money has been allocated for irrigation enterprises, it has been allocated for dams, it has been allocated for various structures, always upon the theory that the construction of any of them would provide work for those in need of it, and therefore would come under the definition of "work relief."

Mr. CONNALLY. Then, is it the view of the Senator from Colorado that the words "provide relief or work relief for persons in need thereof" are broad enough to include the allocation of funds for a project, although all of the labor on the project might not be relief labor? Suppose it were necessary to employ technical engineers and others?

Mr. ADAMS. We have already made provision for the payment of administrative expenses. We have a provision that a certain percentage may be used for administrative expenses.

Mr. CONNALLY. The reason why I ask the question is that this whole appropriation of a billion and a half dollars in general, as I view it, is a continuation of similar appropriations made in prior years. It seems to me that a project which has already been approved and half completed ought not to be cut off by a provision which would limit the right of the President to allocate additional funds to go ahead and complete the project.

Mr. ADAMS. Personally I do not think there is any question but that under this language the right will still exist to go on with the project.

Mr. McKELLAR. Unquestionably it will still exist, Mr. President. In the instance the Senator from Texas gives, unquestionably the work would go on.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the specific project, if I may. It is a series of dams on the Colorado River, designed both for power and for flood control. One of those dams, known as the Marshall Ford Dam, is in a state of half completion, but the funds have become exhausted.

Mr. McKELLAR. W. P. A. funds?

Mr. CONNALLY. W. P. A. funds, part of them. I am not sure that they are all from W. P. A. or whether some of them are from P. W. A.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think some of them are, and probably all of them are; and they will come in under the title we are just about to consider.

Mr. HAYDEN. No, Mr. President. All the allocations made to the Department of the Interior from the $4,800,000,000 and the $3,300,000,000, heretofore appropriated for relief purposes, if unexpended, will be made available for those particular purposes by a provision in the Interior Department appropriation bill, which has passed the House of Representatives. In other words, the curative legislation is contained in that bill, just as curative legislation has been enacted with respect to the employees' compensation funds that have been set up. The Senator from Texas need have no fear that any of the previous allocations to the United States Reclamation Service will be lost. It is not expected, however, that any substantial part of the $1,500,000,000 carried in this bill for relief will be expended upon regular public-works projects.

Mr. CONNALLY. Now we are getting down to the point. Eminent members of the Committee on Appropriations are disagreeing about this matter. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] says money could be allocated for this purpose. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the acting chairman of the committee, says it could be. Now probably the most eminent authority on Government money in the Senate tells me it cannot be done.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator stated that allocations had heretofore been made from previous relief appropriations to certain projects in Texas, and that the work was undertaken by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the allocations to reclamation projects are in existence and the money has not been spent the Interior Department appropriation bill provides that the money so allocated shall be reappropriated and made available for the next fiscal year.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose the actual amount that was allocated has been expended, but the project has not been completed, what will the situation be?

Mr. ADAMS. I think we would be justified in construing it as a relief measure, even in the situation the Senator from Texas states.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it would be relief.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question but what relief labor could be assigned to a project of that type, but it is not expected, as I understand it, that large allocations shall be taken from the billion and a half and applied to what are normally known as public-works projects. Congress is either taking care of public-works projects by title 2 of this bill or by regular appropriations from the Treasury for the public-works projects which have been heretofore adopted for construction.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is no doubt correct in that, but I want to know whether legally, according to the practice of the Committee on Appropriations, it could be done.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no doubt about the power of the President under this bill to allocate money for the purpose suggested by the Senator from Texas. The chairman is right in so stating what it is possible for the President to do.

Mr. CONNALLY. Now that we have an agreement of all three of the eminent Senators, I subside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 16, line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, after line 22, it is proposed to insert title 2, as follows:

TITLE II

SECTION 201. The Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works (herein called the "Administration") is hereby continued until June 30, 1939, and until said date is hereby authorized to continue to perform all functions which it is authorized to perform on the date of the enactment of this joint resolution. All provisions of existing law relating to the availability of funds for carrying out any of the functions of said Administration are hereby continued until June 30, 1939, except that the date specified in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936, prior to which, in the determination of the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works (herein called the "Administrator") a project can be substantially completed is hereby changed from "July 1, 1938" to "July 1, 1939."

SEC. 202. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation (herein called the "Corporation") is hereby authorized to purchase, from time to time, upon the request of the Administrator, securities now held and securities hereafter acquired by the Administrator in order to provide such funds as the Administrator shall deem necessary or advisable to carry out the provisions of this title. The amount which the Corporation is authorized by existing law to have invested at any one time in securities purchased from the Administrator is hereby increased by such an amount as may be necessary to enable the Corporation to make such purchases.

SEC. 203. For the purpose of maintaining or increasing employment by providing for useful public works, the Administrator is hereby authorized to use, in his discretion and under his direction, from funds on hand or to be realized from the sale of securities now held and securities hereafter acquired by the Administrator, not to exceed $200,000,000 for grants, and not to exceed $100,000,000 for loans, to aid in the financing of any projects for which allotments have been recommended by the examining divisions of the Administration prior to the enactment of this joint resolution, but for which no grant or loan contracts have been made and which are of the kind and character specified in section 205 of this title, without regard to any provision of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936 limiting the amount of such funds which may be used for grants: Provided, That the grant for any such project shall be in an amount equal to 45 percent of the cost of such project, as determined by the Administrator, except that the grant for any project for which an allotment is made under subdivisions (e) or (f) of section 205 of this title shall be as provided in such subdivision.

SEC. 204. The Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1938, is hereby amended by striking out the words "in connection with the liquidation" in the provision relating to administrative expenses of the Administration; and in addition to the funds made available for administrative expenses in said act, the Administrator is hereby authorized to use during the fiscal year 1938 not to exceed $5,000,000, and during the fiscal year 1939 not to exceed $10,000,000 from funds on hand or to be realized from the sale by the Administrator of securities now held and securities hereafter acquired by him, for the payment of administrative expenses of a character for which funds are authorized to be used by the Administrator pursuant to existing law.

SEC. 205. The funds made available to the Administrator under section 203 of this title shall be used by the Administrator for the making of loans or grants, or loans and grants for projects of the following classes, in amounts not to exceed the sums specified for each such class: (a) For school projects [other than those included in subdivisions (b) and (c) of this section] to replace, eliminate, or ameliorate existing school facilities or conditions which, in the determination of the Administrator, are hazardous to the life, safety, or health of school children, $60,000,000 for grants and $11,000,000 for loans; (b) for projects which have been authorized, or for the financing of which bonds or other obligations have been authorized, at elections held prior to April 24, 1937, or for projects for which revenue bonds have been authorized by State legislatures under the law of the State where the project is located; $58,000,000 for grants and $7,000,000 for loans; (c) for projects for which appropriations have been made by the legislatures of the States, $15,000,000 for grants and $2,000,000 for loans; (d) for projects to be financed, except for the grant, by the issuance to contractors of tax or assessment securities at not less than their par value: Provided, That an allotment shall not be made for any such project unless the applicant has, in the determination of the Administrator, made or incurred substantial expenditures or obligations in contemplation of receiving an allotment, $5,000,000 for grants; (e) for projects for which funds have been tentatively earmarked by the Administrator but for which formal allotments have not been made, $54,000,000 for grants and $78,000,000 for loans: Provided, That the grant for any such project shall not exceed the amount tentatively earmarked as a grant for such project; (f) for miscellaneous projects not included within any of the foregoing groups, $8,000,000 for grants and $2,000,000 for loans: Provided, That the grant for any such project may be less than 45 percent of the cost of such project, as determined by the Administrator.

SEC. 206. No new applications for loans or grants for non-Federal projects shall be received or considered by the Administration after the date of enactment of this joint resolution.

SEC. 207. The Administrator is hereby authorized, from funds on hand or to be realized from the sale by the Administrator of securities now held and securities hereafter acquired by him, to make loans which are necessary, in the determination of the Administrator, to protect investments in securities purchased and held by him: Provided, That the total amount of such loans shall not exceed the sum of $10,000,000.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the able Senator who has this amendment in charge that we now recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock. I understand there will be some debate on this proposal.

Mr. HAYDEN. So far as I know, there are only two or three minor amendments to be offered to the committee amendment, and they will be accepted. I can state in a brief time the objects sought to be accomplished by the amendment.

The Senate will remember that a recommendation came to this body from the President to extend the life of the Works Progress Administration for another 2 years. That recommendation is carried out in this amendment.

The first section of title II provides for the continuation of the Public Works Administration until June 30, 1939, and authorizes it to perform its existing functions in connection with projects of States, municipalities, and other public bodies which can be substantially completed by July 1, 1939, instead of July 1, 1938, as now provided by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936. It is essential to continue the Public Works Administration, not only to complete projects now under construction but also to enable the Government to aid in financing those projects where a clear moral obligation exists to make the necessary loans and grants.

The second section of title II authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make available the amount of money necessary to enable the Public Works Administration to carry out these functions. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is also released from the provisions of the Emergency Appropriation Act of 1935, which limits to $250,000,000 the amount of securities purchased from the Public Works Administration which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may hold at any one time. Under the committee amendment, for every dollar turned over from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Public Works Administration at least an equal amount of bonds will be delivered by the Public Works Administration to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Similar bonds purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from the Public Works Administration have already been sold by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at a profit in excess of $10,000,000.

Section 203 is intended to permit the Administrator of Public Works to use the moneys realized from the sale of securities to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and otherwise, to finance projects authorized by this part of the joint resolution. This section removes the limitation of $300,000,000 on the amount of grants which can be made from the revolving fund of the Public Works Administration which was imposed by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936 but limits the amount of money which the Administration is authorized to use to $200,000,000 for grants and to $100,000,000 for loans to aid in the financing of any projects for which allotments have been recommended by the examining divisions of the Administration prior to the enactment of this act but for which no grant or loan contracts have been made, provided that such projects are of the kind and character authorized by this joint resolution.

This section also requires that the grant for any of these previously approved projects shall be equal to 45 percent of the cost of the projects, except (1) that the grant for any project for which funds have been tentatively earmarked by the Administration but for which formal allotments have not been made, shall not exceed the amount so earmarked, and (2) that the grant for any miscellaneous projects may be less than 45 percent. In this way, projects may be financed as originally intended on a 45 percent grant basis without regard to Administrative Order No. 197, which now limits the grant to the amount of wages paid to workers taken from relief rolls plus 15 percent of such amount.

The fourth section of title II permits the use from the Public Works Administration revolving fund of the sum of $5,000,000, excluding $10,000,000 authorized by the Independent Offices Administration Act, 1938, for administrative expenses during the fiscal year 1938. The sum of $10,000,000 is made available from funds on hand or to be realized from the sale of securities now held and hereafter acquired for such expenses during the fiscal year 1939.

The Senate will also remember that on the floor of the body at the other end of the Capitol the relief bill, the first part of the measure we are now considering, was earmarked to the extent of $300,000,000 for public-works projects; that is, to take $300,000,000 out of the $1,500,000,000 and assign it to public works. An amendment to that effect was adopted in the Committee of the Whole. Then the majority leader, after consultation with the President, reported to the Members of the other body, on June 1, that all that could be accomplished by handling the matter in that way could just as well be done by using the revolving fund of the Public Works Administration. It was set out in some detail in the other body what various kinds of projects would be undertaken within the limitations of the Public Works revolving fund.

To accomplish that same purpose I offered an amendment which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The committee called Colonel Hackett before it and asked him to indicate by classes what would be necessary to carry out the commitments made to the House. What Colonel Hackett has recommended is found in section 205 of the pending amendment.

The total of the loans and grants included in the classes of projects specified by section 205 of title II equals the total loans and grants which the Public Works Administration is authorized to make under that title. The total amount of grants is $200,000,000, and the total amount of loans is $100,000,000.

Class (a) covers those projects involving the construction of school facilities to ameliorate conditions hazardous to the life, safety, or health of school children. As of April 20, 1937, there were projects of this character in every State in the Union except one. The total amount of grant involved is approximately $80,000,000, and the total amount of loan involved is approximately $12,000,000. Since almost $20,000,000 in grants and $1,000,000 in loans for this type of project are included in the amounts set forth in subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 205 it has been possible to fix the maximum limitation on the grants at $60,000,000 and the maximum limitation on the loans at $11,000,000. The hazards covered are fire, health hazards, including sanitation and ventilation, panic hazards due to overcrowding, and similar perilous conditions.

Class (b) covers those projects for the construction or financing of which elections have been held prior to April 24, 1937. April 24, 1937, is the date of Administrative Order No. 197. As to elections held prior to that date, it was felt that a moral obligation existed. Based upon statistics submitted by Colonel Hackett to the committee, the amount of $58,000,000 has been fixed for grants for such projects and $7,000,000 for loans.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. May I ask the Senator whether the amount here provided is sufficient to take care of all those obligations where bond elections have been held?

Mr. HAYDEN. Colonel Hackett reported to the committee that it is sufficient, and it is so understood by the committee.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is the intention of the committee?

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly. The item set out here as presented by the Works Progress Administrator will carry out all of the commitments made in that respect to the House of Representatives.

Class (c) covers those projects for which appropriations have been made by the legislatures of the States. The amount of $15,000,000 has been fixed for grants and the amount of $2,000,000 for loans in this class. The Legislatures of Alaska, Arizona, Connecticut, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, North Dakota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, South Carolina, Vermont, Washington, and West Virginia have made appropriations in contemplation of 45-percent grants. The amount included in subdivision (c) may not be sufficient to cover all such projects, but a fair proportion of them will be made possible by the sums thus fixed.

Class (d) covers those projects which cannot be financed by municipalities in many States in the ordinary way by the issuance of bonds on the open market. In some States certain types of public improvements, especially street and sewer improvements, can be financed only by the issuance of warrants or bonds payable from taxes or assessments to the contractors who do the job. In other States, although this is not the only way of financing such improvements, it is the usual way. Unless aid is received from the Public Works Administration by way of grant, as contemplated by these municipalities, it will be practically impossible for these obligations to be discharged. Approved applications in this class have been filed by municipalities in Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Washington, Texas, and other States. It should be pointed out that no grant will be made under this subdivision unless the Administrator finds that the community has incurred substantial expenditures in contemplation of receiving such a grant.

Class (e) includes those projects for which funds have been tentatively earmarked but for which allotments have not been made. This category includes a few large projects for which funds have already been earmarked and a few scattered miscellaneous projects. The large projects are as follows:

	Loan	Grant
The General State Authority of Pennsylvania (earmarked for a State-wide institutional-building program)	$45,000,000	$20,000,000
The South Carolina Public Service Authority (also called the Santee-Cooper project, earmarked in addition to the allotment)	14,850,000	16,650,000
The Central Nebraska Public Power and Irrigation District	11,053,000	9,043,000
A slum-clearance and low-rent housing project for the city of Chicago	6,800,000	5,500,000

Class (f) allocates $8,000,000 for grants and $2,000,000 for miscellaneous projects not included within any of the foregoing groups. It was suggested to the committee that those applicants who are willing to receive less than a 45-percent grant and accept a grant in the amount of 115 percent of the wages paid to workers taken from relief rolls, as provided by administrative order 197, should not be discriminated against but funds should be made available so that such applicants could go ahead with their projects. About 25 such projects have been approved by the examining divisions of the Public Works Administration.

The committee did not desire to exceed the amount of $200,000,000 for grants and $100,000,000 for loans provided in section 203, and therefore the amounts in subdivision (f) represent the difference between the total amounts fixed in the other categories and the $300,000,000 loan and grants provided for by that section.

The sixth section of title II provides that no new applications shall be received or considered by the Administrator after the enactment of this act.

The last section of title II authorizes the Administrator to make loans to the extent of $10,000,000 from the funds available to him, whenever such loans are deemed necessary to protect investments held or purchased by him.

Title II offers a practical solution of the problem faced by the Government in fulfilling its moral commitments, and is consistent with the representations that have been made to the House of Representatives. The appropriation for the Works Progress Administration is left intact. The committee amendment does not earmark any of the funds appropriated by title I of the joint resolution, nor does it necessitate any increase in the appropriation of $1,500,000,000, and thus it will not unbalance Treasury estimates of expenditures. At the same time it permits the Public Works Administration to complete that portion of its program of non-Federal public works which appear to be most desirable.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment on page 19, at the end of line 20, to add certain language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 19, line 20, after the numerals "1937", to insert "for projects for which revenue bonds have been authorized by State legislatures under the law of the State where the project is located."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in some cases cities have voted bonds to pay the contributions. There are a few cases where the legislatures have authorized authority to issue bonds, and the amendment is to expand the word "election" to include those cases where legislatures have passed measures authorizing authority to issue bonds which has the same effect as if the authority should vote the bonds. That is the only purpose of the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have conferred with members of the committee, and we are willing to take the amendment to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on page 19, line 20, I move to strike out "April 24, 1937", and to insert in lieu thereof "the approval of this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in section 205, on page 20, line 15, I move to strike out the period after the word "Administrator" and to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That the amount specified for any of the foregoing classes may be increased by not to exceed 15 percent thereof by transferring an amount or amounts from any other class or classes in order to effectuate the purposes of the title.

I call attention to the fact that this provision is in title 1 of the bill, on page 4, and it should also be in title 2. It merely advises the Department that in the event some of the money is not going to be used in one of the classes, it may be transferred and used in a different class.

I am sure this is entirely agreeable to the Department. I have taken the matter up with the Senator from Arizona, and I think he is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the amendment seeks to provide the same rule with respect to the Public Works Administration as is provided in title I of the joint resolution for the Works Progress Administration, where classes or categories of projects are limited. I see no reason why we should not take the amendment to conference.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the provision is in title I, I think it should be in title II. I ask the Senator where the language is to be inserted.

Mr. WHEELER. On page 20, line 15, after the word "Administrator."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does that complete the committee amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the purpose and desire of the Senator in charge of the joint resolution to proceed further today?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, it just depends on the Senator from Arkansas, and how much there may be ahead of us to intervene between now and the final passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to see the joint resolution completed today, if it is practicable to do so. However, I do not think the Senate would be justified in remaining in session a long time for that purpose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have been waiting patiently to submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I have no illusions as to its fate, but I feel required to extend the philosophy behind it in the RECORD. I think the joint resolution ought to go over until tomorrow. The whole thing can be out of the way in 30 minutes. Of course, I shall proceed tonight if I am required to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask whether there are other amendments to be offered?

Mr. McNARY. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has an amendment which he desires to present, and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] wishes to offer an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand there are a number of Senators on this side, including the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and perhaps some other Senator who would like to offer amendments. That being so, I think perhaps the joint resolution may just as well go over until tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment I have in mind will take only a moment, because I understand it will not be objected to by the Senator having the measure in charge.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations (and withdrawing a nomination), which were referred to the appropriate committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Army nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Navy.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the nominations in the Navy be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations in the Navy are confirmed en bloc.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 22, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JUNE 21, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. C. E. Hawthorne, pastor of the Wallace Memorial United Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our help in ages past, our hope for years to come, we bow reverently and humbly before Thee, and would offer our prayer in the confident faith that Thou art able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think. As we look back over the years our hearts are filled with gratitude and praise, for Thou hast blessed our Nation, Thou hast guided through the hard places, Thou hast reached toward us Thy hand of blessing. By the grace of God we are what we are, and we thank Thee. But past blessings do not suffice. The challenge of the present hour confronts us. And we come seeking for this day Thy continued guidance and blessing. Guide these Thy servants, the Members of Congress, in the deliberations of this day. Grant them Thy wisdom and the guiding strength of Thy hand. O God, bless our Nation. Our hearts are troubled as we see strife and bitterness among our people. Have mercy upon us; and in the solution of these problems may we seek the will of our God and become obedient to it. Hear our prayer this day and answer us, for we come in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 18, 1937, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 18. Concurrent resolution to authorize and direct the Clerk of the House, in the enrollment of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1938 (H. R. 4064), to make a change in the text of the appropriation for pensions under the Veterans' Administration.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 10. Concurrent resolution accepting the statue of Gen. William Henry Harrison Beadle, to be placed in Statuary Hall.

DELIVERY OF THE MAILS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the most scandalous exhibition of cowardice I have ever witnessed is that now displayed by the Government as regards delivery of the mails. Time sufficient for further consideration and reversal of position has elapsed. It appears nothing will be done. The power of the Government has been set at naught. It has surrendered to a handful of lawless people and stands before the country a discredited thing.

So long as this lawless, revolutionary movement does not obstruct the normal functions of instrumentalities of the Federal Government it may properly be considered as a local question and dealt with by the States affected; but when it stops the delivery of the mails and dams up the channels of interstate commerce it becomes national in character and should be dealt with by the National Government.

It is no concern of ours, Mr. Speaker, that a partnership between politics and the C. I. O. should exist in the strike-ridden States, but it becomes a matter of our deepest concern when effort is made to broaden this partnership to include the Federal Government or should reach the point of denying to the people in the States affected a democratic form of government.

It is my belief that if the existing police force is inadequate to cope with the situation, every soldier of the Republic should be summonsed to be used as civil instruments to enforce Federal power and uphold the majesty of the law. This lawlessness of the C. I. O. and its affiliates and this shameful cringing of government to them is not only wrecking the great labor movement, as guided by the A. F. of L., but, unchallenged and unchecked, will wreck the Government as well.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the fact that the urge is to turn away from orderly government as practiced for more than a hundred and fifty years, and that to speak up for liberty is to invite ridicule; but there are those who still love liberty and want government by law. It is to give voice to their fears and indignation that I speak.

There is still time sufficient to stop the play of this tragedy of tragedies, this wrecking of the Government of the United States. Shall we sit here like huddled, terror-stricken cattle and see the country swept into a state of anarchy, or shall we, like brave soldiers, bare our bosoms and meet the attack on every hand?

The hour for action has struck. The crisis is on. So let us, according to our understanding and ability, be up and doing. Let us see that our Government is worthy of the support which law-abiding and God-fearing people give it. [Applause.]

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia may have permission to sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

SALARY OF DEPUTY UNITED STATES MARSHALS

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6453, to increase the minimum salary of deputy United States marshals to $2,000 per annum.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That effective beginning July 1, 1937, the compensation of deputy United States marshals who are paid on a salary basis, other than those whose principal duties are of a clerical nature, shall be at the rate of not less than $2,000 per annum.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REVISION OF AIR-MAIL LAWS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4732, to revise the air-mail laws.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

PREFERRED EMPLOYMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS BY THE GOVERNMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3423, to provide for the preferred employment of American citizens by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to the gentleman's request.

Just for the purpose of information, will the gentleman tell us what the objection is, so that we may be able to come to some agreement on this bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think perhaps eventually we may come to some agreement on it, but I understand there is a minority report on the bill, and I do not see the signers of the minority report on the floor. I am merely protecting the signers of the minority report in asking that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COCHRAN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

HARRY W. BLAIR

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4740, limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain cases.

Mr. SNELL, Mr. WOLCOTT, and Mr. MICHENER objected.

FEDERAL SUBSISTENCE HOMESTEADS CORPORATIONS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3058, for the relief of former employees of the Federal Subsistence Homesteads Corporations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if there is some one here who can give us some information about what is involved in this bill. I would like very much to be advised, and I am sure the House is interested in discovering what these corporations are, the stock of which is owned by the Subsistence Homesteads Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go to the end of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman intend by his request that the bill shall again be called today?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill may go to the foot of the call of today's calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIAN CLAIMS COMMISSION

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1902, to create an Indian Claims Commission, to provide for the powers, duties, and functions thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very important bill. It has to do with the creation of an Indian Claims Commission, and under the terms of the bill all the cases now pending in the Court of Claims can be transferred to this proposed commission.

The Committee on Indian Affairs has the call on Wednesday next, and I believe this to be too important a matter to be taken up at this time, and therefore I shall object. If the committee wants the bill considered, it can call up the measure Wednesday.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment and yield to me?

Mr. COCHRAN. I will.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman realize that this is an administration measure?

Mr. COCHRAN. It does not make any difference to me whether this is an administration measure or not. I am aware the Commissioner of Indian Affairs wants this bill, and through his influence a favorable report came from the Department of the Interior, but I will say if this bill is called up Wednesday I am prepared to show just what it is going to cost the Government if it should pass. I cannot conceive the House will put its stamp of approval on such a bill if the facts are in possession of the Members. You can disregard millions and think of billions if the Indian claims ever gets in the hands of this commission and the right to offset the claims by the Government is denied. I repeat, disregard millions but think of billions in judgments.

Mr. Speaker, Friday I placed in the RECORD a statement about Indian claims. On June 1 the Court of Claims decided a suit based on a bill that was favorably reported by the Department of the Interior that will cost the people of this country over $4,000,000. Three days ago another case was decided by the Court of Claims, the claim of the Klamath Indians, and this after the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court had denied that there was any obligation on the part of the Government. The decision which was rendered the other day resulted from a change in the jurisdictional act. This change was made by this Congress after two courts had spoken. I was sick in bed at the time or the bill would never have passed. While I do not know the exact amount of money involved, it is going to cost the taxpayers of this country several million dollars, and I may say to the gentleman that his committee reported the bill that changed the jurisdictional act in the last Congress which enabled the Indians to obtain this judgment. The decision will probably be published by the Court of Claims today. It has already been handed down.

You have any number of bills pending asking that Congress change the jurisdictional acts. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] asked that we change a jurisdictional act in, I think, the Crow case, and he argued that you did so for the Klamaths, why not in this case. Well, I say to the gentleman that if I had been here the Klamath's bill would not have passed, at least under the unanimous-consent rule. The day is not far distant when Members of Congress are going to pay more attention to these bills. I do not blame the Representatives of the Indians, as the Indians are their constituents, but it is for the lawyers that most of the bills are passed. The Indians sign up and the lawyers have a binding agreement.

What was the contention in the Klamath case? The lawyers contended that the amount paid the Indians for land was not in keeping with the value at the time. Then 50 or 75 years after they come in and want the Government to raise the price of the land and make up the difference. Why not bring in a bill to reimburse the great-great-grandchildren of the original owners of the land the Capitol now stands on, saying that the price paid the original owner was below the real value. It would be just as meritorious as this Indian claim was. Mr. Speaker, I decline to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. WOLCOTT, and Mr. RICH objected.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 102, to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are three coinage bills on the calendar. I understand that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has definitely decided that these are the only three bills that are going to be reported out and considered at this session of Congress. I would like to inquire of some member of the committee whether my understanding in this respect is correct or not.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Last week we had two bills on the calendar and the same statement was made. I notice now there are three similar bills on the calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I understand that at that time the Committee was considering and had agreed to report out the California bridge bill, which is now on the calendar.

Mr. COCHRAN. In the absence of the chairman of the committee and as ranking member, I will say to the gentleman that bill has been reported out by the committee and is on the calendar and can be considered today.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is the gentleman from Missouri in position to assure us that these three bills are the only measures of this nature which the committee expects to report out at this session of Congress?

Mr. COCHRAN. I cannot speak for the committee, but I can speak for myself as ranking member of the committee, and so far as I am concerned, these are the only bills of this kind that will be reported out. I will further say that in the very near future I propose to address the House on this subject and I am sure I will then present to the House an argument that will prevent the passage of such measures for all time. I have the facts, will assemble them, and I propose to show what a graft the issuance of commemorative half dollars has been. We offer some protection by amendments to these bills.

The reason it was agreed to report the three bills on the calendar today was that in the last session the Maryland and Virginia bills both passed the House, one passed the Senate, but a slight amendment kept it from being sent to the White House. A promise was made then, as I understand it, that the two bills would be passed at this session and the committees in charge of the celebrations went along with preparation for the events. Had this not been presented to the committee in this way I would have opposed these bills. The third bill, the San Francisco Bridge commemorative coin bill, passed in the closing days of the session. There were two bridges, but the bill as drawn provided for 200,000 coins for one bridge. When an effort was made to amend it, we were advised it was too late. The officials in charge of one celebration agreed to issue only 100,000 coins and kept the promise. Now, this bill provides that the other 100,000 can be issued to commemorate the construction of the second bridge. In view of the understanding in the last session I offered no objection to the favorable report on this bill, but knowing the situation as I do I cannot retain my self-respect and agree to the passage of any additional commemorative coin bills. I can tell the House now I will show the coins are not issued so much to commemorate an event as they are to make money to pay expenses of the celebrations.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam there shall be coined at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint not to exceed 50,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition and of a special appropriate single design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1937, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the Washington County Historical Society of Hagerstown, Md., upon payment by it of the par value of such coins, but not less than 25,000 such coins shall be issued to it at any one time and no such coins shall be issued after the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such Washington County Historical Society of Hagerstown, Md., and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the commemoration of such event.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "a" and insert "one", and after the word "mint", insert the word "only."

On page 2, line 14, after the word "Maryland", insert "subject to the approval of the Director of the Mint."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY, NORFOLK, VA.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 4) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the original Norfolk (Va.) land grant and the two hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the city of Norfolk, Va., as a borough.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the original Norfolk (Va.) land grant and the two hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the city of Norfolk, Va., as a borough there shall be coined at a mint of the United States to be designated by the Director of the Mint not to exceed 20,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition and of a special appropriate design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1936, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the Norfolk Advertising Board, Inc., affiliated with the Norfolk Association of Commerce, upon payment by it of the par value of such coins, but not less than 5,000 such coins shall be issued to it at any one time and no such coins shall be issued after the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such association, and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the commemoration of such event.

SEC. 3. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same; regulating and guarding the process of coinage; providing for the purchase of material and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins; for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting; for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the article "a" and insert "one", and after the word "mint", in line 7, insert the word "only."

Page 1, line 8, strike out the word "twenty" and insert "twenty-five."

Page 2, line 12, strike out the word "five" and insert "twenty-five."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "association", insert "subject to the approval of the Director of the Mint."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 363, to authorize an additional appropriation to further the work of the United States Constitution Sesquicentennial Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. By the adoption of this joint resolution we declare whether we want the United States Constitution Sesquicentennial Commission to continue throughout this year. The bill originally provided for an appropriation of $350,000, but in accordance with our desire to keep our appropriations within the fiscal years, that was cut $200,000, and this joint resolution undertakes to appropriate the remaining $150,000, which was in the original bill last year. This is the year commemorating the sesquicentennial of the adoption of the Constitution. For that reason personally I have no objection to the bill, but I think the House should understand that this bill means the continuation of this Sesquicentennial Commission.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman from Michigan think that we have spent a reasonable amount on this celebration up to the present time?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It seems to me that $200,000 should have been all that is necessary. We have to stop this somewhere.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman that we have to stop it somewhere, and I am one who will endeavor to stop it right now. I am willing to take the responsibility to be one of three to object to any further expenditure along that line, although I think they have done good work heretofore. With the present condition of the Treasury, every man on the Democratic side ought to object.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL, Mr. RUTHERFORD, and Mr. CRAWFORD objected.

JEFFERSON DAVIS NATIONAL HIGHWAY

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1468) authorizing the erection in the District of Columbia of a suitable terminal marker for the Jefferson Davis National Highway.

Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. RICH, and Mr. WADSWORTH objected.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, POPLAR, MONT.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6496) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Montana, or the counties of Roosevelt, Richland, and McCone, singly or jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Missouri River at or near Poplar, Mont.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Montana, the counties of Roosevelt, Richland, and McCone thereof, or any of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Poplar, Mont., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DIKE IN MISSOURI RIVER, PIERRE, S. DAK.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6693) to legalize a dike in the Missouri River, 6$^{9}/_{10}$ miles downstream from the South Dakota State highway bridge at Pierre, S. Dak.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the dike constructed from the left bank of the Missouri River to Farm Island, mile 1167.1 above the mouth, or 6$^{9}/_{10}$ miles downstream from the South Dakota State highway bridge at Pierre, S. Dak., by the South Dakota State Highway Commission, be, and the same is hereby, legalized to the same extent and with like effect as to all existing or future laws and regulations of the United States as if it had been constructed in accordance with the approved plans: Provided, That any changes in said dike which the Secretary of War may deem necessary and order in the interest of navigation shall be promptly made by the owner thereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS WABASH RIVER, LOCKPORT, IND.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6636) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Carroll, in the State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Wabash River at or near Lockport, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS MERRIMACK RIVER, MASS.

The Clerk called the bill H. R. 6920, granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Middlesex County, and the city of Lowell, Mass., or any two of them, or any one of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Merrimack River at Lowell.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Middlesex County and the city of Lowell, Mass., or any two of them, or any one of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Merrimack River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Lowell, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS TO TRY PETTY OFFENDERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4011) to confer jurisdiction upon certain United States commissioners to try petty offenses committed on Federal reservations.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any United States commissioner specially designated for that purpose by the court by which he was appointed shall have jurisdiction to try and, if found guilty, to sentence persons charged with petty offenses against the law, or rules and regulations made in pursuance of law, committed in any place over which the Congress has exclusive power to legislate and within the judicial district for which such commissioner was appointed. The probation laws shall be applicable to persons so tried before United States commissioners. For the purposes of this act, the term "petty offense" shall be defined as in section 335 of the Criminal Code (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 541). If any person charged with such petty offense shall so elect, however, he shall be tried in the district court of the United States which has jurisdiction over the offense.

SEC. 2. In all cases of conviction by United States commissioners an appeal shall lie from the judgment of the commissioner to the district court of the United States for the district in which the offense was committed. The Supreme Court shall prescribe rules of procedure and practice for the trial of cases before commissioners and for taking and hearing of appeals to the said district courts of the United States.

SEC. 3. United States commissioners specially designated under authority of section 1 of this act shall receive for services rendered under this act the same fees, and none other, as provided for like or similar services in other cases under section 21 of the act of May 28, 1896 (29 Stat. 184; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 597).

SEC. 4. This act shall not be construed as in any way repealing or limiting the existing jurisdiction, power, or authority of United States commissioners, including United States commissioners appointed for the several national parks and United States commissioners in Alaska.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 7, after the period, insert:

"The commissioner before whom the defendant is arraigned shall apprise the defendant of his right to make such election and shall not proceed to try the case unless the defendant, after being so apprised, signs a written consent to be tried before the commissioner."

Page 3, at the end of the bill, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. The provisions of this act shall not apply to the District of Columbia."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO BANKRUPTCY ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4343) to amend section 77B of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (c) of section 77B of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 11, sec. 207 (c)), is amended by inserting after clause (3) thereof the following: "(3½) may, for cause shown, and in accordance with such rules as to notice and hearing as the Supreme Court may prescribe, authorize the debtor, or the trustee or trustees, if appointed, to lease or sell, upon such terms and conditions as may be approved by the judge, any property of the debtor, whether real or personal."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ARCHITECTS

The Clerk called Senate Joint Resolution 111, to provide that the United States extend to foreign governments invitations to participate in the International Congress of Architects, to be held in the United States during the calendar year 1939, and to authorize an appropriation to assist in meeting the expenses of the session.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to invite foreign governments to participate in the International Congress of Architects to be held in the United States during the calendar year 1939.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of organizing and holding the Fifteenth International Congress of Architects, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, communication services, stenographic, and other services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); travel expenses, local transportation, hire of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding, entertainment, official cards, purchase of newspapers and periodicals, necessary books and documents, stationery, membership badges, and such other expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of observance of appropriate courtesies in connection therewith, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments have been made for any purposes herein specified, for the fiscal year 1939.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERISHABLE AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES ACT, 1930

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6762, to amend the act known as the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, approved June 10, 1930, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman referring to Calendar No. 283?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes. I am making this request for this purpose. It is a long bill and a very complicated bill, and I think should be given consideration.

Mr. BUCK. I thought I had discussed this matter with the gentleman and that there was no possible objection to the bill. It has a unanimous report from both sides of the House in the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I clear up in my own mind——

Mr. BUCK. Certainly. I will be glad to answer any question about it, but the bill is one which deals with a subject that has been approved by the Department of Agriculture and has met with the approval of the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is right. I have the wrong bill in mind. I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his request that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 6 of section 1 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(6) The term 'dealer' means any person engaged in the business of buying or selling in carloads any perishable agricultural commodity in interstate or foreign commerce, except that (A) no producer shall be considered as a 'dealer' in respect of sales of any such commodity of his own raising; (B) no person buying any such commodity solely for sale at retail shall be considered as a 'dealer' in respect of any such commodity in any calendar year until his purchases of such commodity in carloads in such year are in excess of 20; and (C) no person buying any such commodity for canning and/or processing within the State where grown shall be considered a 'dealer' whether or not the canned or processed product is to be shipped in interstate or foreign commerce, unless such product is frozen or packed in ice within the meaning of paragraph 4 of this section. Any person not considered as a 'dealer' under clauses (A), (B), and (C) may elect to secure a license under the provisions of section 3, and in such case and while the license is in effect such person shall be considered as a 'dealer'. As used in this paragraph, the term 'in carloads' includes wholesale or jobbing quantities as defined for any such commodity by the Secretary;".

SEC. 2. That subsection 5 of section 2 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(5) For any commission merchant, dealer, or broker, to misrepresent by word, act, mark, stencil, label, statement, or deed the character, kind, grade, quality, condition, degree of maturity, or State or country of origin of any perishable agricultural commodity received, shipped, sold, or offered to be sold in interstate or foreign commerce."

SEC. 3. That subsection 6 of section 2 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(6) For any commission merchant, dealer, or broker, for a fraudulent purpose, to remove, alter, or tamper with any card, stencil, stamp, tag, or other notice placed upon any container or railroad car containing any perishable agricultural commodity, if such card, stencil, stamp, tag, or other notice contains a certificate or statement under authority of any Federal or State inspector or in compliance with any Federal or State law or regulation as to the grade or quality of the commodity contained in such container or railroad car or the State or country in which such commodity was produced."

SEC. 4. That section 2 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended by adding a new subsection, no. 7, and reading as follows:

"(7) For any commission merchant, dealer, or broker, without the consent of an inspector, to make, cause, or permit to be made any change by way of substitution or otherwise in the contents of a load or lot of any perishable agricultural commodity after it has been officially inspected for grading and certification, but this shall not prohibit re-sorting and discarding inferior produce."

SEC. 5. That section 3 (a) of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following:

"Any person violating this provision may, upon a showing satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, or his authorized representative, that such violation was not willful but was due to inadvertence, be permitted by the Secretary, or such representative, to settle his liability in the matter by the payment of the fees due for the period covered by such violation and an additional sum, not in excess of $25, to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture or his authorized representative. Such payment shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in the same manner as regular license fees."

SEC. 6. That section 4 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) Whenever an applicant has paid the prescribed fee the Secretary, except as provided elsewhere in this act, shall issue to such applicant a license, which shall entitle the licensee to do business as a commission merchant and/or dealer and/or broker unless and until it is suspended or revoked by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of this act, or is automatically suspended under section 7 (d) of this act, but said license shall automatically terminate on any anniversary date thereof unless the annual fee has been paid: Provided, That notice of the necessity of paying the annual fee shall be mailed at least 30 days before the anniversary date: Provided further, That if the annual fee is not paid by the anniversary date the licensee may obtain a renewal of that license at any time within 30 days by paying a fee of $15;

"(b) The Secretary shall refuse to issue a license to an applicant (1) if he finds that the applicant has previously been responsible in whole or in part for any violation of the provisions of the act for which a license of the applicant, or the license of any partnership, association, or corporation in which the applicant held any office or, in the case of a partnership, had any share or interest, was revoked under the provisions of section 8; or (2) if at any time within 2 years he has found after notice and hearing that said applicant was responsible in whole or in part for any flagrant or repeated violation of the provisions of section 2; or (3) if he finds, in case the applicant is a partnership, association, or corporation, that any individual holding office or, in the case of a partnership, having any interest or share in the applicant, has previously been responsible in whole or in part for any violation of the provisions of the act for which the license of such individual, or of any partnership, association, or corporation in which such person held any office or, in the case of a partnership, had any share or interest, was revoked under the provisions of section 8; or (4) if at any time within 2 years he has found after notice and hearing, in case the applicant is a partnership, association, or corporation, that any individual holding any office or, in the case of a partnership, having any interest or share in the applicant was responsible in whole or in part for any flagrant or repeated violation of the provisions of section 2; or (5) if he finds that the applicant, subject to his right of appeal under section 7 (c), has failed, except in case of bankruptcy, to pay within the time limit provided therein any reparation order which has been issued within 2 years against him as an individual, or against a partnership of which he was a member, or an association or corporation in which he held any office, or, in case the applicant is a partnership, association, or corporation, that any individual holding any office or, in the case of a partnership, having any interest or share in the applicant, subject to his right of appeal under section 7 (c), has failed, except in the case of bankruptcy, to pay within the time limit provided therein any reparation order which has been issued within 2 years against him as an individual or against a partnership of which he was a member, or an association or corporation in which he held any office. Notwithstanding all of the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, the Secretary, in the case of such applicant, may issue a license if the applicant furnishes a bond or other satisfactory assurance that his business will be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the act and that he will pay all reparation orders which may previously have been issued against him for violations, or which may be issued against him within 2 years following the date of the license, subject to his right of appeal under section 7 (c), but such license shall not be issued before the expiration of 1 year from the date of revocation of license or from the date of the Secretary's finding that the applicant has been responsible, in whole or in part, for any flagrant or repeated violation of section 2. Such bond shall be in an amount sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture to insure payment of such reparation orders;

"(c) The Secretary shall refuse to issue a license to an applicant if he finds after notice and hearing that at any time within 2 years said applicant has been found guilty in a Federal court of having violated the provisions of the act known as the Produce Agency Act (7 U. S. C., secs. 491–497), or of having violated section 14 (b) of this act, or, in case the applicant is a partnership, that any member of the partnership was found guilty within 2 years of having violated the Produce Agency Act, or section 14 (b) of this act, or, if the applicant is an association or corporation, that any officer or any person holding a responsible position therein has been found within 2 years to have been guilty of violating the Produce Agency Act or section 14 (b) of this act;

"(d) The Secretary may withhold the issuance of a license to an applicant, for a period not to exceed 30 days pending an investigation, for the purpose of determining (a) whether the applicant is unfit to engage in the business of a commission merchant, dealer, or broker by reason of having prior to the date of the application engaged in any practice of the character prohibited by this act, or (b) whether the application contains any materially false or misleading statement or involves any misrepresentation, concealment, or withholding of facts respecting any violation of the act by any officer, agent, or employee of the applicant. If after investigation the Secretary believes that the applicant should be refused a license, the applicant shall be given an opportunity for hearing within 60 days from the date of the application to show cause why the license should not be refused. If after the hearing the Secretary finds that the applicant is unfit to engage in the business of a commission merchant, dealer, or broker by reason of having prior to the date of the application engaged in any practice of the character prohibited by this act, or because the application contains a materially false or misleading statement made by the applicant or by its representative on its behalf, or involves a misrepresentation, concealment, or withholding of facts respecting any violation of the act by any officer, agent, or employee, the Secretary shall refuse to issue a license to the applicant."

SEC. 7. That paragraph (a) of section 5 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) If any commission merchant, dealer, or broker violates any provision of section 2 he shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for the full amount of damages sustained in consequence of such violation."

SEC. 8. That paragraph (b) of section 6 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any officer or agency of any State or Territory having jurisdiction over commission merchants, dealers, or brokers in such State or Territory and any employee of the United States Department of Agriculture or any interested person may file, in accordance with rules and regulations of the Secretary, a complaint of any violation of any provision of this act by any commission merchant, dealer, or broker and may request an investigation of such complaint by the Secretary."

SEC. 9. That paragraph (e) of section 6 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(e) If a complaint is made by a nonresident of the United States, the complainant shall be required, before any formal action is taken on his complaint, to furnish a bond in double the amount of the claim conditioned upon the payment of costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee for the respondent if the respondent shall prevail, and any reparation award that may be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture against the complainant on any counter claim by respondent: Provided, That the Secretary shall have authority to waive the furnishing of a bond by a complainant who is a resident of a country which permits the filing of a complaint by a resident of the United States without the furnishing of a bond."

SEC. 10. That section 7 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) If after a hearing on a complaint made by any person under section 6, or without hearing as provided in section 6, paragraphs (c) and (d), or upon failure of the party complained against to answer a complaint duly served within the time prescribed, or to appear at a hearing after being duly notified, the Secretary determines that the commission merchant, dealer, or broker has violated any provision of section 2, he shall, unless the offender has already made reparation to the person complaining, determine the amount of damage, if any, to which such person is entitled as a result of such violation and shall make an order directing the offender to pay to such person complaining such amount on or before the date fixed in the order;

"(b) If any commission merchant, dealer, or broker does not pay the reparation award or the judgment of the court within the time specified in the Secretary's order, or within 10 days from the date of the judgment, the complainant, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may within 3 years of the date of the order file in the district court of the United States for the district in which he resides or in which is located the principal place of business of the commission merchant, dealer, or broker, or in any State court having general jurisdiction of the parties, a petition setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages and the order of the Secretary in the premises. The orders, writs, and processes of the district courts may in these cases run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States. Such suit in the district court shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that the findings and orders of the Secretary shall be prima-facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and the petitioner shall not be liable for costs in the district court, nor for costs at any subsequent state of the proceedings, unless they accrue upon his appeal. If the petitioner finally prevails, he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of the costs of the suit;

"(c) Either party adversely affected by the entry of a reparation order by the Secretary may, within 30 days from and after the date of such order, appeal therefrom to the district court of the United States for the district in which said hearing was held. Such appeal shall be perfected by the filing of a notice thereof, together with a petition in duplicate, which shall recite prior proceedings before the Secretary and shall state the grounds upon which petitioner relies to defeat the right of the adverse party to recover the damages claimed, with the clerk of said court, with proof of service thereof upon the adverse party, together with a bond in double the amount of the reparation award, conditioned upon the payment of the judgment entered by the court plus interest and costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee for the appellee, if the appellee shall prevail. The clerk of court shall immediately forward a copy thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall forthwith prepare, certify, and file in said court a true copy of the Secretary's decision, findings of fact, conclusions, and order in said case, together with copies of the pleadings upon which the case was heard and submitted to the Secretary. Such suit in the district court shall be a trial de novo and shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that the findings of fact and order or orders of the Secretary shall be prima-facie evidence of the facts therein stated. Appellee shall not be liable for costs in said court; and if appellee prevails, he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of his costs. Such petition and pleadings certified by the Secretary upon which decision was made by him shall upon filing in the district court constitute the pleadings upon which said trial de novo shall proceed subject to any amendment allowed in that court;

"(d) Unless the licensee against whom a reparation order has been issued shows to the satisfaction of the Secretary within 5 days from the expiration of the period allowed for compliance with such order that he has either taken an appeal as herein authorized or has made payment in full as required by such order, his license shall be suspended automatically at the expiration of such 5-day period until he shows to the satisfaction of the Secretary that he has paid the amount therein specified with interest thereon to date of payment: Provided, That if on the appeal the appellee prevails or if the appeal is dismissed the automatic suspension of license shall become effective at the expiration of 10 days from the date of the judgment on the appeal unless prior thereto the judgment of the court has been satisfied."

SEC. 11. That section 8 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) Whenever (a) the Secretary determines, as provided in section 6, that any commission merchant, dealer, or broker has violated any of the provisions of section 2, or (b) any commission merchant, dealer, or broker has been found guilty in a Federal court of having violated section 14 (b) of this act, the Secretary may publish the facts and circumstances of such violation and/or, by order, suspend the license of such offender for a period not to exceed 90 days, except that, if the violation is flagrant or repeated, the Secretary may, by order, revoke the license of the offender;

"(b) The Secretary may, after 30 days' notice and an opportunity for a hearing, revoke the license of any commission merchant, dealer, or broker who, after the date given in such notice, continues to employ in any responsible position any individual whose license was revoked or who was responsibly connected with any firm, partnership, association, or corporation whose license has been revoked. Employment of such individual by a licensee in any responsible position after 1 year following the revocation of any such license shall be conditioned upon the filing by the employing licensee of a bond, in such reasonable sum as may be fixed by the Secretary, or other assurance satisfactory to the Secretary that its business will be conducted in accordance with the provisions of this act;

"(c) If, after a license shall have been issued to an applicant, the Secretary believes that the license was obtained through a false or misleading statement in the application therefor or through a misrepresentation, concealment, or withholding of facts respecting any violation of the act by any officer, agent, or employee, he may, after 30 days' notice and an opportunity for a hearing, revoke said license, whereupon no license shall be issued to said applicant or any applicant in which the person responsible for such false or misleading statement or misrepresentation, concealment, or withholding of facts is financially interested, except under the conditions set forth in paragraph (b) of section 4.

"(d) In addition to being subject to the penalties provided by section 3 (a) of this act, any commission merchant, dealer, or broker who engages in or operates such business without a valid and effective license from the Secretary shall be liable to be proceeded against in any court of competent jurisdiction in a suit by the United States for an injunction to restrain such defendant from further continuing so to engage in or operate such business, and, if the court shall find that the defendant is continuing to engage in such business without a valid and effective license, the court shall issue an injunction to restrain such defendant from continuing to engage in or to operate such business without such license."

SEC. 12. That section 14 of the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Secretary is hereby authorized, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the Government, State, or municipal agencies and/or any person, whether operating in one or more jurisdictions, to employ and/or license inspectors to inspect and certify, without regard to the filing of a complaint under this act, to any interested person the class, quality, and/or condition of any lot of any perishable agricultural commodity when offered for interstate or foreign shipment or when received at places where the Secretary shall find it practicable to provide such service, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, including the payment of such fees and expenses as will be reasonable and as nearly as may be to cover the cost for the service rendered: Provided, That fees for inspections made by a licensed inspector, less the percentage thereof which he is allowed by the terms of his contract of employment with the Secretary as compensation for his services, shall be deposited into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts; and fees for inspections made by an inspector acting under a cooperative agreement with a State, municipality, or other person shall be disposed of in accordance with the terms of such agreement: Provided further, That expenses for travel and subsistence incurred by inspectors shall be paid by the applicant for inspection to the United States Department of Agriculture to be credited to the appropriation for carrying out the purposes of this act: And provided further, That official inspection certificates for fresh fruits and vegetables issued by the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to any law shall be received by all officers and all courts of the United States, in all proceedings under this act, and in all transactions upon contract markets under Commodities Exchange Act (7 U. S. C., supp. 2, secs. 1 to 17 (a)), as prima-facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained;

"(b) Whoever shall falsely make, issue, alter, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, issued, altered, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aid, cause, procure, or assist in, or be a party to the false making, issuing, altering, forging, or counterfeiting of any certificate of inspection issued under authority of this act, the Produce Agency Act of March 3, 1927 (7 U. S. C., secs. 491–497), or any act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture; or shall utter or publish as true or cause to be uttered or published as true any such false, forged, altered, or counterfeited certificate, for a fraudulent purpose, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for a period of not more than 1 year, or both, at the discretion of the court."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 20, after the word "broker", insert "for a fraudulent purpose."

Page 10, line 4, strike out the word "If" and insert the words "In case."

Page 11, line 8, strike out "or the judgment of the court."
Page 11, line 9, strike out "or within 10 days from the date of the judgment."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAPAGO INDIAN RESERVATION IN ARIZONA

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1806, to extend the boundaries of the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, inasmuch as the Committee on Indian Affairs has the call on Calendar Wednesday this week, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the committee has a number of bills on the calendar and if this is a bill that can be considered on this calendar I see no reason why it should not be considered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say there are several Members who would object to the bill. I think the gentleman had better take it up and discuss it, because any bill which adds land to an Indian reservation ought to be explained more fully than we are able to explain it on this calendar.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. We will be glad to do so right now if the gentleman will allow us.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. There is frequently objection to adding land to an Indian reservation. I know that to be true in several Western States. In this case the Board of Supervisors of Pima County, Ariz., has given consent, so the bill has merit, I am sure, or objection would have been made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that this bill go over without prejudice?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much land does this bill put into the reservation?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. It adds 640 acres that are now occupied by a full-blooded Papago Indian who has been on the land for 40 years. It adds 52,000 acres, some of which is privately owned and some of which is public land. The amount that is involved in the bill is coming from funds that have already been appropriated under the Reorganization Act of June 18, 1934, and it would not cost any additional money; no additional appropriation is required.

Mr. RICH. It takes 52,000 acres of land which you are going to put in a reservation and the Government has to maintain that. The State will lose taxation on it.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. This land is now occupied by the Indians. They are using the land now. This bill is merely to straighten out the reservation.

Mr. RICH. Was it approved by the Indian Service?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Yes. It is a departmental bill.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. This land, having never been on the tax rolls, has paid no taxes to Arizona nor to Pima County. If a considerable tax loss would result from the passage of this measure, I would oppose it. I, too, feel that we must be very careful about taking land off the local tax rolls to bring it under governmental control. However, this bill does not do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that the bill go over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

INDIAN LANDS IN ARIZONA

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2188, to amend section 3 of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984–988) relating to Indian lands in Arizona.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, for the same reason I ask that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman going to continue this procedure on all these Indian bills? As I said before, the Committee on Indian Affairs has several bills on the calendar. It will save a lot of time on Calendar Wednesday to dispose of some of the bills today. We may not be able to reach all these bills on Wednesday.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am trying to save time today, and to provide an opportunity to take the bill up and discuss it if we want to discuss it.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. But the Committee on Indian Affairs has a right to be heard on Consent Calendar day the same as any other committee. Just because the Indian Affairs Committee happens to have the call on Wednesday is no reason why Indian bills on the Consent Calendar should not be considered today along with other bills.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am not denying the committee any right to be heard today, but Calendar Wednesday is set aside for the purpose of discussing these bills.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. All the committees have their turn on Calendar Wednesdays.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Indians Affairs Committee happens to have the call on Wednesday. Some of these bills are of a controversial nature. If when they are taken up the House does not care to discuss them they will be passed, so no time is lost if the bill is passed over without prejudice.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. These bills are also on the Union Calendar. If we have to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as to every one of these bills we will not be able to dispose of many of them on Calendar Wednesday. If they were House bills it would be a little different.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman will bear in mind that last year we were dispensing with business in order on Calendar Wednesday week after week and, as a consequence, this Consent Calendar was cluttered up with bills of very great importance and we had to spend a great deal of time on controversial matters on Consent Calendar day. The purpose of Consent Calendar day, as I understand it, is to facilitate the passage of bills about which there is little or no dispute.

I may say to the gentleman that in all probability there will be some dispute concerning some of these bills, for there always is dispute concerning Indian bills; and inasmuch as the Indian Affairs Committee has the call on Wednesday I can see no particular harm in these bills going over.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I think we should consider this bill. I see no objection whatever to its passage. It comes out of the Indian Affairs Committee with a favorable report. In fact, it is a departmental measure which I was only too glad to introduce. The bill rights a wrong and attempts to do justice to the Papago Indians. It has great merit on that ground.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Regardless of the merits of the bill, I think it should be considered, and I insist upon my request that it go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT and Mr. RICH objected.

BRIDGE ACROSS WABASH RIVER, LOCKPORT, IND.

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 278, H. R. 6636, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the county of Carroll, in the State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Wabash River at or near Lockport, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Carroll, in the State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Lockport, Ind., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMISSION TO CITIZENSHIP OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6785, for the admission to citizenship of aliens who came into this country prior to February 5, 1917.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there is no departmental report accompanying this bill I ask unanimous consent that it may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

TERM OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT MALONE, N. Y.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5963, providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York at Malone, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York shall be held annually at Malone, N. Y., on the second Tuesday in July: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Malone, N. Y., are furnished without expense to the United States.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so to ask a question of the distinguished minority leader. Will this bill, which the gentleman introduced, place any added cost on the Government?

Mr. SNELL. I am very pleased to announce to the distinguished gentleman from New York that it does not put any added cost on the Government; furthermore, it will save money for the Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. There will be no expense for courtroom or marshals?

Mr. SNELL. Not a single thing. We have plenty of them there now.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. That is fine.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. May I say that the United States Federal attorney for that district is a very good Democrat.

Mr. SNELL. I thought so.

Mr. MEAD. And he recommended this legislation to me personally.

Mr. SNELL. Then it must be all right.

Mr. MEAD. And he urged me to cooperate with the distinguished gentleman; therefore I can see no objection to this bipartisan attempt to improve the situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The Clerk read the Committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, after line 8, insert the following: "until, upon the recommendation of the Attorney General, such accommodations are furnished by the United States."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COURT OF COLUMBIA, TENN.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6358, to amend section 107, as amended, of the Judicial Code so as to eliminate the requirement that suitable accommodations for holding court at Columbia, Tenn., be provided by the local authorities.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second proviso of section 107, as amended, of the Judicial Code (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 28, sec. 188) is amended by striking out "that suitable accommodations for holding the courts at Winchester, Columbia, and Cookeville shall be provided by the local authorities without expense to the United States", and inserting in lieu thereof "that suitable accommodations for holding the courts at Winchester and Cookeville shall be provided by the local authorities without expense to the United States."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "out", strike out the remainder of line 5 and all of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, and on page 2, strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert the following: "until, subject to the recommendation of the Attorney General of the United States with respect to providing such rooms and accommodations for holding court at Columbia, a public building shall have been erected or other Federal space provided for court purposes in said city."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONVEYANCE BY THE UNITED STATES TO THE STATE OF WISCONSIN OF A PORTION OF THE TWIN RIVER POINT LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1961, to authorize the conveyance by the United States to the State of Wisconsin of a portion of the Twin River Point Lighthouse Reservation, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey to the State of Wisconsin for State park purposes all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to that portion of the Twin River Point Lighthouse Reservation, Manitowoc County, Wis., which is not required to be retained for lighthouse purposes. The Secretary of Commerce shall describe by metes and bounds in the deed of conveyance the exact portion of such reservation transferred.

SEC. 2. Such conveyance shall contain the express condition that if the State of Wisconsin shall at any time cease to use the property as a State park for public recreation, or shall alienate or attempt to alienate such property, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 3. The United States reserves the right to resume ownership, possession, and control for Government purposes, of any property conveyed under authority of this act, at any time and without the consent of the State of Wisconsin.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of Commerce is also authorized, in his discretion, to lease to the State of Wisconsin for a period of 25 years that portion of the Twin River Point Lighthouse Reservation not conveyed by him under authority of this act. Such lease shall be subject to revocation at any time by the Secretary of Commerce.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COAST GUARD STATION AT OR NEAR MANISTIQUE, MICH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3414, to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Manistique, Mich.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill, S. 1374, to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Manistique, Mich., may be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a Coast Guard station at or in the vicinity of Manistique, Schoolcraft County, Mich., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A House bill (H. R. 3414) was laid o nthe table.

COAST GUARD STATION AT MENOMINEE, MICH.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3416, to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at Menominee, Mich.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar Senate bill, S. 119, to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Menominee, Mich., will be considered in lieu of the House bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a Coast Guard station at or near Menominee, Mich., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A House bill (H. R. 3416) was laid on the table.

THREE COAST GUARD STATIONS ON THE NORTH SHORE OF LAKE SUPERIOR

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5040, to provide for the establishment of three Coast Guard stations on the north shore of Lake Superior.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the north shore of Lake Superior, at or near Hovland, Minn., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the north shore of Lake Superior, at or near Beaver Bay, Minn., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the north shore of Lake Superior, at or near Two Islands, Minn., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a Coast Guard station at or near Beaver Bay, Minn., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Beaver Bay, Minn."

COAST GUARD STATION AT ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5140, to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at St. Augustine, Fla.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish a Coast Guard station at St. Augustine, Fla., at such point as the Commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "at", insert the words "or near."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near St. Augustine, Fla."

FISHERIES OF ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5860, making further provision for the fisheries of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this bill prohibits the taking of salmon with a stake or set net by anyone for commercial purposes only and does not affect an individual who is fishing for his own family, regardless of whether he has lived in the area for 5 years or not?

Mr. BLAND. I am not sure about that question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I have in mind if a person moves into this area and takes it up as his bona-fide residence, then he may take fish for his own use.

Mr. BLAND. I think that is probably true. The Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND] is particularly informed about this matter, but he is unable to be here today. I think if there is any question about this it would be better to pass it over without prejudice.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIEN VETERANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4291, to extend further time for naturalization to alien veterans of the World War under the act approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 165), to extend the same privileges to certain veterans of countries allied with the United States during the World War, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the author of the bill to explain it. There are several questions raised in the report that I would like to have answered. In view of the fact the gentleman is not present at the moment, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN SIOUX INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7328, to authorize an appropriation to carry out the provisions of the act of May 3, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 484), and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation is hereby authorized in the sum of $79,038 to pay various Sioux Indians of the Pine Ridge Reservation, S. Dak., the amounts which have been awarded to them by the Secretary of the Interior under the act of May 3, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 484), on account of allotments of land to which they were entitled but did not receive: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to determine what attorney or attorneys have rendered services of value in behalf of said Indians and to pay such attorney or attorneys on such findings when appropriation is available the reasonable value of their services, not to exceed 10 percent of the recovery on each individual claim, which payment shall be in full settlement for all services rendered by the attorney or attorneys to the claimants in such claim.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECORDS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The Clerk called House Resolution 222, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed, upon the requisition of the Archivist of the United States, in accordance with sections 3 and 6 of the National Archives Act (48 Stat. 1122–1124), to transfer to his custody for storage and preservation in the National Archives Building any and all archives and records of the House of Representatives of the United States which the Clerk of the House may deem not necessary for use in the current business of the House of Representatives or which he may consider to be in such physical condition that they cannot be used without danger of damage to them, and for which, in his opinion, he is unable to provide adequate or safe storage.

Mr. KELLER and Mr. WOLCOTT rose.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

FLOOD CONTROL

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 175) to authorize the submission to Congress of a comprehensive national plan for the prevention and control of floods of all the major rivers of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it appears to me the committee has taken a very desirable flood-control bill and changed its identity into that of a power bill. This bill provides by the committee amendment that "the Board of Engineers shall set forth the values of such projects for hydroelectric development and other conservation purposes."

I do not believe flood control should be tied up with hydroelectric development at the present time. We have an emergency concerning these flood conditions. The quicker we can get at the control of floods the better it will be for the country. I do not think the Board of Engineers of the War Department should be encumbered with hydroelectric development in the protection of the lives and property of our citizens in a flood-control program.

Furthermore, I call attention to the fact that hydroelectric power development should be given a great deal of consideration by the House, because every time we authorize a Passamaquoddy, a T. V. A., and a Coulee Dam we take that much business away from the coal miners. We have passed bills here—the Guffey coal bill, and so forth—for the purpose of protecting the coal miner. If we would give more thought to the protection of the coal-mining industry in this country and less thought to the development of hydroelectric power, which is putting the coal miners out of employment, we might not have as much labor trouble in the United States as we have today.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL SURPLUS COMMODITIES CORPORATION

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2439, to extend the time for purchase and distribution of surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes and to continue the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice, and pending that request, I call the attention of the House to the fact the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is a Delaware corporation and is in the business of taking agricultural surpluses off the market, the same as the Commodity Credit Corporation. The opponents of the old Farm Board, which was accomplishing the same purpose with respect to wheat and corn, should give consideration to this set-up along with the Commodity Credit Corporation, and determine whether they want to continue this policy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

SALE OF CHICKASAW DORMITORY PROPERTIES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7409, providing for the sale of the two dormitory properties belonging to the Chickasaw Nation or Tribe of Indians, in the vicinity of the Murray State School of Agriculture at Tishomingo, Okla.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, to be consistent, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

ARCHIVES OF THE TERRITORIES OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2242, to further amend an act entitled, "An act to authorize the collection and editing of official papers of the Territories of the United States now in The National Archives", approved March 3, 1925, as amended.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 168d of the act entitled "An act to authorize the collection and editing of official papers of the Territories of the United States now in national archives", approved March 3, 1925, as amended by the act approved February 28, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. 7, title V, sec. 168a), and by the act approved February 14, 1936 (49 Stat. 1139), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not more than the sum of $125,000, and under this authorization not more than $50,000 shall be appropriated for any one year" and inserting in lieu thereof the following "there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not more than the sum of $250,000, and under this authorization not more than $25,000 shall be appropriated for any one year."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ACCOMMODATIONS FOR HOLDING COURT AT SHAWNEE, OKLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4605, relating to the accommodations for holding court at Shawnee, Okla.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is my understanding that the proposal here is to allow the Federal Government to build court facilities in Shawnee, Okla., when a Federal building is constructed there. However, I understand the amount of business requires that the court sit for only one week during the year and, therefore, I believe the expenditure that would be required is excessive and unnecessary and for this reason I shall object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. COSTELLO. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOREN. Shawnee, Okla., is the fourth largest town in the State of Oklahoma. It has been designated as a Federal court town for approximately 2 years now but has never yet had a session of Federal court there because there are not proper facilities available. The Joint Committee of the Post Office and Treasury Departments is preparing to construct adequate facilities for a post office in a year or two hence, and the necessity has been clearly shown. They advise me it is reasonable in constructing this building, if it can be so arranged, to provide court accommodations, and I do not want to quote them. But I do say that they must recognize two factors: First, they must erect the building, and, in the second place, court can never be held in Shawnee under present arrangements. I am only asking for the removal of a restriction.

Mr. COSTELLO. According to the committee report, it is shown that the proposed building would cost $250,000, but in order to hold court there it would be necessary to construct two additional stories on the proposed building. As a result, the cost of the building would be not in excess of $450,000. It appears to me this is an excessive amount, and, further, it is my understanding the Attorney General has reported that adequate facilities are available at the present time for the holding of court. So it seems to me, if adequate facilities are available without expense to the Federal Government, certainly there cannot be any justification for incurring an expense of approximately $200,000 for the holding of court in the Federal building rather than in facilities provided by the city of Shawnee, and for this reason, Mr. Speaker, I shall insist upon the objection.

Mr. BOREN. If the gentleman will further withhold his objection, it is my understanding that the proposed building which is to cost $250,000, would be adequate to house the court, and for this reason I want to challenge the gentleman's figures.

Mr. COSTELLO. The figures I am quoting are taken from the committee's report on the bill, and, apparently, the figures are taken from a letter from the Director of Procurement under date of April 19, 1937, which appears on page 2 of the committee report. This is the basis on which I made my statement that the present proposal for constructing the Federal building there would only cost $250,000 and that an additional expense of $200,000 would be necessary if the additional stories were added to the building in order to provide courtroom facilities.

Mr. BOREN. If I may make one further statement in reply to the gentleman, I would remind the gentleman that the city of Shawnee is the fourth largest city in the State and it is many miles removed from any other sitting of the Federal court, and I call attention to the further point that the figures the gentleman has stated are not in accordance with my own conference with the Post Office and Treasury committee about the matter.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there appears to be some doubt about the accuracy of the figures set forth in the committee report, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SARATOGA NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK, N. Y.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4852, to provide for the creation of the Saratoga National Historical Park in the State of New York, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when title to all the lands, structures, and other property in the military battlefield area and other areas of Colonial and Revolutionary War interest at and in the vicinity of Saratoga, N. Y., as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, in the exercise of his discretion, as necessary or desirable for national historical park purposes, shall have been vested in the United States, such areas shall be, and they are hereby, established, dedicated, and set apart as a public park for the benefit and inspiration of the people and shall be known as the Saratoga National Historical Park: Provided, That such areas shall include at least that part of the Saratoga Battlefield now belonging to the State of New York.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept donations of land, interests in land, and/or buildings, structures, and so forth, within the boundaries of said historical park as determined and fixed hereunder and donations of funds for the purchase and/or maintenance thereof, the title and evidence of title to lands acquired to be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That he may acquire on behalf of the United States, out of any donated funds, by purchase when purchasable at prices deemed by him reasonable, otherwise by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888, such tracts of land within the said historical park as may be necessary for the completion thereof.

SEC. 3. That the administration, protection, and development of the aforesaid national historical park shall be exercised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the National Park Service, subject to the provisions of the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes", as amended.

SEC. 4. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OYSTER CULTURE IN ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1561, for the protection of oyster culture in Alaska.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved June 6, 1924, entitled "An act for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes" (43 Stat. 464), as amended by the act of Congress approved June 18, 1926 (44 Stat. 752), is further amended by striking the period after the words "Alaskan Territorial waters", where they occur at the end of the second proviso, and inserting a colon in lieu thereof and after the colon the following: "Provided further, That the Secretary of Commerce, in his discretion, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem fair and reasonable, is hereby authorized to lease bottoms in Alaskan Territorial waters for bona-fide oyster cultivation for commercial purposes."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STONY POINT LIGHT STATION RESERVATION, ROCKLAND COUNTY, N. Y.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7401, to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to the Commissioners of the Palisades Interstate Park, a body politic of the State of New York, certain portions of the Stony Point Light Station Reservation, Rockland County, N. Y., including certain appurtenant structures, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to convey to the Commissioners of the Palisades Interstate Park, for use for public-park purposes, certain portions of the Stony Point Light Station Reservation, State of New York, including certain appurtenant structures, which are not required to be retained for lighthouse purposes. The Secretary of Commerce shall describe by metes and bounds in the deed of conveyance the exact portions of the reservation transferred. The deed of conveyance shall also contain a clause that should the property so transferred at any time cease to be used for park purposes or for some other wholly public use, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 2. In exchange for the property to be transferred the Commissioners of the Palisades Interstate Park shall transfer title to the United States to the dwelling now erected on the portion of land retained by the United States for lighthouse purposes. The United States also reserves the rights-of-way over, underground, or across the area to be transferred for any use whatsoever in conducting the Lighthouse Service or other activities of the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARINE HOSPITAL, FLORIDA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4716) authorizing the construction and equipment of a marine hospital in the State of Florida.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire by gift, purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in the State of Florida, to be selected by the Federal Board of Hospitalization, and to cause to be erected thereon a suitable building or buildings for a marine hospital, together with the necessary auxiliary structures, equipment, furniture, accessories, appurtenances, approaches, walkways, roads, parkways, ground improvements, wharfage, dockage, and trackage facilities, heating, ventilation, air conditioning, water, sewers and sanitary facilities, and the necessary preparation and improvements to the site.

SEC. 2. That the plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and the cost thereof, including the cost of the site and the improvement thereof, shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,500,000 to carry out the provisions of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RED LAKE BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4540) authorizing the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota to file suit in the Court of Claims, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. I object.

PER-CAPITA PAYMENT TO RED LAKE BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS, MINNESOTA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4539) authorizing a per-capita payment of $25 each to the members of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians from the proceeds of the sale of timber and lumber on the Red Lake Reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I do not see why there should be any objection to this bill. It does not cost the Government one cent. The Red Lake Band of Indians in Minnesota has a large reservation and they have a great deal of timber. They have a sawmill, and operate it. This year $110,000 was set aside out of that sawmill fund to operate the mill, and the mill is running at the present time. After the $110,000 is deducted, $211,000 is left in the fund. After deducting the $25 per-capita payment, which would be about $45,000, there would still be $166,000 left in the fund. This money belongs to the Indians, and I can see no reason why this bill should not pass. Again I hope the gentleman does not object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am doing this to preserve the tribal funds. The Acting Secretary of the Interior reports that the Indians have been taken care of pretty well. The sum of $75,000 has been allocated this year for the construction of roads and buildings on the reservation, and in addition he says that a very generous emergency conservation work program, amounting to about $130,000 this year, has been carried out on the Red Lake Reservation for the benefit of the Indians; also, that the logging and sawmill operations have provided opportunity for work for these Indians, and that a total of $110,000 has been allotted so far this year for these operations.

I think probably more important than that is his statement that money paid out in small amounts to the Indians is soon spent with nothing of any permanent nature to show for it. I dislike very much to let the bill go through because of the adverse report of the Acting Secretary of the Interior, and for the further reason that the Indian Affairs Committee has the call on Wednesday next; I am being consistent in objecting to the bill in order that it may be considered on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MEMORIAL TO WILL ROGERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 6482) providing for cooperation with the State of Oklahoma in constructing a permanent memorial to Will Rogers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The present bill before the House apparently would appropriate some $500,000 to cooperate with the State of Oklahoma in constructing a Will Rogers memorial. In reading over the legislation and in reading the committee report it appears that this memorial, instead of being a memorial to the late Will Rogers, would in fact be nothing more than an Indian museum, in which a large variety of Indian relics would be stored and collected for public exhibition. In spite of the fact that I join with every Member of the House in paying tribute to the memory of the late Will Rogers, I still do not believe that the use of his name should be made an excuse for taking from the Federal Treasury the sum of $500,000 to create a museum of Indian relics. If it were just a memorial to be devoted entirely to the memory of Will Rogers, I certainly would have no objection, but it seems this is merely an attempt to use the name of Will Rogers in creating a new museum for Indian relics in the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has arrived at an entire misconception, in my judgment, of the object of the bill, because it is a matter that had been studied very carefully and thoroughly before it was brought to the Library Committee. There the whole matter was presented very fully, so that the committee reports unanimously that the bill ought to become a law.

It is not an Indian museum at all, but there is a movement there for the retention of Indian relics because Mr. Rogers was part Indian, as we all know. He was very much interested in those things. On the other hand, the gentleman fails to call attention to the fact that the bill provides for public subscriptions to take up part or all of this $500,000, and it is my opinion, and the opinion of the committee, that the entire amount can be raised through public subscription, and the commission provided for is empowered to go at it in that way. It is the feeling of the committee as it is my own that the public is tremendously interested in a proper memorial, and the memorial provided here is a proper memorial, in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that I have arrived at an entire misconception of the object of the bill, I will state that I have received my information in reading the report of which he is the author, on page 5, the following appears:

> The opportunity to further the collection of many of the relics of the story of the Indians as they are concentrated in this region, and to further the interest of the "newer" sections of the Nation in preserving what is still available of their traditions and relics, in such a way that they become public is one that the committee feels should not be lost.

Mr. KELLER. That is quite true, of course, but that is only a small part of the report.

Mr. COSTELLO. The balance of the report is a letter and some of the testimony that was presented to the committee. Apparently very little concerning the late Will Rogers will be incorporated in this museum, from what I gather after reading the committee report very thoroughly. For that reason I do not believe it is proper to simply play upon the name of Will Rogers in creating a number of memorials all over the country, not actually memorials to him. If they are going to build a memorial to Will Rogers I should be glad to see the Federal Government cooperate and join therein, but I do not think we should play upon that name as a means of creating a museum for some other purpose.

Mr. KELLER. The implication of the gentleman that there is any possible desire on the part of the committee or on the part of the people of Oklahoma to play upon the name of Will Rogers is entirely gratuitous and I am sure the gentleman does not believe that.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for me to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Is the amount of money $500,000?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. TOBEY. Would the gentleman be favorable to an amendment to this bill limiting the raising of this money to public subscriptions rather than from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. KELLER. That is provided for in the bill; that the commission shall have that power.

Mr. TOBEY. Solely?

Mr. KELLER. Not solely; no, sir.

Mr. TOBEY. Will the gentleman permit me to amend the bill to make it solely from that source?

Mr. KELLER. Since the author of the bill does not happen to be here, I should rather that would be put up to him.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this matter has been submitted to the Bureau of the Budget or any other governmental department for their consideration?

Mr. KELLER. The author of the bill can state that. I do not know.

Mr. DISNEY. It has not.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the departments have not given any opinion with regard to this legislation it may be well to agree to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon after the disposition of legislative matters, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has been allotted 15 minutes in which to address the House. Following that address, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] was allotted 15 minutes. I have just been advised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] is unable to be here, and I ask unanimous consent, with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], that I be permitted to use his time following the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a speech made by General Craig, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, at the commencement exercises at West Point last week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MCFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the nature of the article?

Mr. POWERS. It was a commencement address at West Point made last week to the graduating class.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

UNITED STATES BOARD OF AWARDS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 171, to create a United States Board of Awards and to provide for the presentation of certain medals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIGHT OF APPEAL FROM SUSPENSION OF LICENSES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7017, to amend section 4450 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of May 27, 1936 (49 Stat. 1380, 1383; U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 46, sec. 239).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4450 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of May 27, 1936 (49 Stat. 1380, 1383; U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 46, sec. 239), is amended by inserting in the third sentence of paragraph (g) of said section the words "suspended or", after the word "is" and before the word "revoked", so that the said paragraph (g) of said section, when amended, shall read as follows:

"(g) In any investigation of acts of incompetency or misconduct or of any act in violation of the provisions of this title, or of any of the regulations issued thereunder, committed by any licensed officer or any holder of a certificate of service, the person whose conduct is under investigation shall be given reasonable notice of the time, place, and subject of such investigation and an opportunity to be heard in his own defense. The whole record of the testimony received by the board conducting such investigation and the findings and recommendations of such board shall be forwarded to the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, and if that officer shall find that such licensed officer or holder of certificate of service is incompetent or has been guilty of misbehavior, negligence, or unskillfulness, or has endangered life, or has willfully violated any of the provisions of this title or any of the regulations issued thereunder, he shall, in a written order reciting said findings, suspend or revoke the license or certificate of service of such officer or holder of such certificate. The person whose license or certificate of service is suspended or revoked may, within 30 days, appeal from the order of the said Director to the Secretary of Commerce. On such appeal the appellant shall be allowed to be represented by counsel. The Secretary of Commerce may alter or modify any finding of the board which conducted the investigation or of the Director of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, but the decision of the Secretary of Commerce shall be based solely on the testimony received by the said board and shall recite the findings of fact on which it is based."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LABOR DISORDERS

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he may address the House for 5 minutes at this time, out of order?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, for several years it has been a self-made rule with me to devote my attention almost exclusively, so far as the House itself is concerned, to subjects originating in the Ways and Means Committee, or having a direct bearing thereon. I have very seldom spoken on other subjects, and hesitate to do so at this time except from a very personal angle.

At the outset I want to be distinctly understood as being a friend of union labor. I believe that labor should be granted and should receive the same consideration and protection under rational law as is accorded to capital. In other words, they are coordinate. I never have taken the part of capital in unfair treatment toward labor, and, conversely, I believe that labor should respect and cooperate with capital for the best interests of both.

Strikes under certain conditions are justifiable; but I can see no reason why the most ardent believer in fair and honest labor organization can possibly justify such methods as have been pursued during the past few months in Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. I am particularly incensed against developments in Youngstown, Ohio. According to press accounts, my nearest relative, aside from my own immediate family, barely escaped being killed there on Saturday. In addition to this, the son of this same person was seriously injured in Muncie, Ind., a few weeks ago, nearly losing his leg as a result of being shot. Both these injuries occurred in connection with this labor warfare.

Let me first rehearse briefly the son's case. A young man by the name of Heaton Vorse, reputed to be a press representative, approached a building where a riot had been in progress. When leaving the car in which he had been riding he was hit by a bullet fired from within the tavern where the riot had taken place. He was there as a press representative, in a sense an innocent bystander, not a participant, and was the victim of reckless shooting by an armed mob.

This young man's mother, a well-known writer who has specialized on labor subjects, was in the streets of Youngstown on Saturday, near a picket line, when it is reported that a bullet grazed her forehead. This woman, Mary Heaton Vorse, is my own cousin and naturally such events as I have referred to arouse a feeling of resentment. The significant thing is that these persons were acting entirely within their rights as American citizens but nevertheless their lives were imperilled. Whatever may have been their reasons for being on the scene of such events is of no moment in this connection.

So let me pass to what seems to me to be the critical point in these occurrences. Thousands of persons have been out of work for weeks, blood has been shed, property has been destroyed, production has ceased, the law has been defied, and courts ignored. Not for shorter hours, not for higher wages, not for better conditions of labor, but solely on the orders of one man that these thousands of people must belong to one particular organization and that their employers must recogninze that one organization in all dealings with their employees. In labor language, this means the closed shop and the check-off, whereby all employees will belong to one organization and the employers must withhold their union dues from their wages and pay the same into the organization.

I do not hesitate to say that the effort to carry out this program is being aided and abetted by the administration. The President has given indirect support to the C. I. O. organization by stating that the officials of the corporations concerned should be willing to sign this kind of an agreement. It is said that the head of the C. I. O. has demanded this support in return for a $500,000 contribution to the Democratic campaign fund. The Post Office Department, according to testimony before the Senate committee on Saturday, instructed its employees not to deliver packages of food sent to nonstrikers remaining within the limits of the plant.

It is not necessary to remind this administration of what Grover Cleveland said about mail when he was President of the United States at the time of the celebrated Pullman strike. He said in effect that a postal card, if properly addressed, would be delivered by the Government if it required the Army of the United States to effect such delivery. Nor is it necessary to remind the administration of the statement made by a former Governor of Massachusetts, the late Calvin Coolidge, to the effect that there is no right to strike against the public safety anywhere, any time, any place.

The present attitude of the administration in these matters is a surface indication of its socialistic and communistic leanings, which remind us of Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin. We are rapidly progressing toward the same ends and accomplishments as have occurred in certain foreign countries. The outstanding difference, however, is the foundation. This is supposed to be a country composed of 125,000,000 free people, whereas those countries have had generations of the rule of autocratic power.

My further indictment against the administration goes to the type of legislation being brought forward in the Halls of Congress, all tending toward the centralization of authority in Washington and the building up of one-man power in America. We are further told that there must be a reorganization of Government functions to remove all independence of action on the part of officials and, under the guise of such reorganization, to place all authority in the hands of the Executive. We are told that a third of the population must divide its personal holdings with another third, leaning very definitely toward the type of government we abhor.

These strikes which are paralyzing industry are the surface indications of a pronounced outbreak. With the aid of the administration and with the forcefulness of the C. I. O. leader, there are two possibilities of relief, namely, dissension in the ranks of labor itself or an uprising of public opinion which will change the attitude of the administration. The time has come when those of us not chained to the chariot of a temporary majority through fear of loss of patronage and the insidious ways of the administration must come out into the open and see if we cannot induce the sensible people of the country, particularly those employed for wages, to throw off this yoke and restore normalcy to the country. In taking this position I am absolutely confident that I represent the views not only of an overwhelming majority of the people of my section of the country, particularly those who have honored me with their support for these many years, but of all right-thinking people everywhere. I shall consider it a privilege to aid in the effort to restore to these people sane and sensible conditions of government and its control. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

CONSENT CALENDAR

PROTECTION OF THE NORTHERN PACIFIC HALIBUT FISHERY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6149, for the protection of the northern Pacific halibut fishery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 1984 may be considered in lieu of this House bill. The Senate bill carries certain slight changes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if the Senate bill is identical with the House bill?

Mr. BLAND. It is practically identical. I have had it looked over. There are, for instance, such changes as this: On page 8, line 17, of the Senate bill the word "hereof" is used instead of the words "of this act." In another place the words "this act" are used instead of the phrase "such provisions of law", and there is a slight change of subsection (c) of section 6. The changes are not substantial at all.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman kindly explain this bill?

Mr. BLAND. The general purpose of this bill is to carry out the halibut convention, which deals with the catch of halibut. It is an international convention that was made many years ago. Recently some changes have been made in the convention. These changes have been ratified by the Senate and by Canada. The result is that unless this bill is passed, under the terms of that old law there may be some question about the enforcement of the old law. In order to provide proper enforcement it is necessary to pass this bill. It was so reported by the State Department and by the Bureau of Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Northern Pacific Halibut Act of 1937."

SEC. 2. When used in this act—

(a) Convention: The word "Convention" means the convention between the United States and Canada for the Preservation of the Halibut Fishery of the Northern Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea, signed at Ottawa on the 29th day of January 1937, and shall include the regulations of the International Fisheries Commission promulgated thereunder.

(b) Commission: The word "Commission" means the International Fisheries Commission provided for by article III of the Convention.

(c) Person: The word "person" includes partnerships, associations, and corporations.

(d) Territorial waters of the United States: The term "Territorial waters of the United States" means the territorial waters contiguous to the western coast of the United States and the territorial waters contiguous to the southern and western coasts of Alaska.

(e) Territorial waters of Canada: The term "territorial waters of Canada" means the territorial waters contiguous to the western coast of Canada.

(f) Convention waters: The term "Convention waters" means the territorial waters of the United States, the territorial waters of Canada, and the high seas of the Northern Pacific Ocean and the Bering Sea, extending westerly from the limits of the territorial waters of the United States and of Canada.

(g) Halibut: The word "halibut" means the species of Hippoglossus inhabiting Convention waters.

(h) Vessel: The word "vessel" includes every description of water craft or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation in water.

SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for—

(a) any person other than a national or inhabitant of the United States to catch or attempt to catch any halibut in the territorial waters of the United States;

(b) any person to transfer to or to receive upon any vessel of the United States, or to bring to any place within the jurisdiction of the United States any halibut caught in Convention waters by the use of any vessel of a nation not a party to the Convention, or caught in Convention waters by any national or inhabitant of the United States or Canada in violation of the Convention or of this act;

(c) any national or inhabitant of the United States to catch, attempt to catch, or to possess any halibut in the territorial waters of the United States or in Convention waters in violation of any provisions of the Convention or of this act;

(d) any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States to furnish, prepare, outfit, or provision any vessel, other than a vessel of the United States or Canada, in connection with any voyage during which such vessel is intended to be, is being, or has been employed in catching, attempting to catch, or possessing any halibut in Convention waters or the territorial waters of the United States or Canada;

(e) any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States to furnish, prepare, outfit, or provision any vessel of the United States or Canada in connection with any voyage during which such vessel is intended to be, is being, or has been employed in catching, attempting to catch, or possessing any halibut in violation of any provision of the Convention or of this act;

(f) any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States or any national or inhabitant of the United States within Convention waters knowingly to have or have had in his possession any halibut taken, transferred, received, or brought in in violation of any provision of the Convention or of this act;

(g) any person to depart from any place within the jurisdiction of the United States in any vessel which departs from such place in violation of the Convention or of this act;

(h) any person in the territorial waters of the United States or any national or inhabitant of the United States in convention waters to catch or attempt to catch any halibut, or to possess any halibut caught incidentally to fishing for other species of fish by the use of or in any vessel required by the Convention to have on board any license or permit unless such vessel shall have on board a license or permit which shall comply with all applicable requirements of the Convention, and which shall be available for inspection at any time by any officer authorized to enforce the Convention or by any representative of the Commission;

(i) any person to take, retain, land, or possess any halibut caught incidentally to fishing for other species of fish, in violation of any provision of the Convention or of this act.

SEC. 4. It shall be unlawful for the master or owner or person in charge of any vessel or any other person required by the Convention to make, keep, or furnish any record or report, to fail to do so, or to refuse to permit any officer authorized to enforce the Convention or any representative of the Commission to examine and inspect any such record or report at any time.

SEC. 5. (a) The provisions of the Convention and of this act and any regulations issued under this act shall be enforced by the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, and the Bureau of Fisheries. For such purposes any officer of the Coast Guard, Customs, or Fisheries may at any time go on board of any vessel in territorial waters of the United States, or any vessel of the United States or Canada in Convention waters, except in the territorial waters of Canada, to address inquiries to those on board and to examine, inspect, and search the vessel and every part thereof and any person, trunk, package, or cargo on board, and to this end may hail and stop such vessel, and use all necessary force to compel compliance.

(b) Whenever it appears to any such officer that any person, other than a national or inhabitant of Canada, on any vessel of the United States is violating or has violated any provision of the Convention or of this act, he shall arrest such person and seize any such vessel employed in such violation. If any such person on any such vessel of the United States is a national or inhabitant of Canada, such person shall be detained and shall be delivered as soon as practicable to an authorized officer of Canada at the Canadian port or place nearest to the place of detention or at such other port or place as such officers of the United States and of Canada may agree upon.

(c) Whenever it appears to any such officer of the United States that any person, other than a national or inhabitant of the United States, on any vessel of Canada in Convention waters, except in the territorial waters of Canada, is violating or has violated any provision of the Convention, such person, and any such vessel employed in such violation, shall be detained and such person and such vessel shall be delivered as soon as practicable to an authorized officer of Canada at the Canadian port or place nearest to the place of detention, or at such other port or place as such officers of the United States and of Canada may agree upon. If any such person on any such vessel of Canada is a national or inhabitant of the United States, such person shall be arrested as provided for in subsection (b) of this section.

(d) Officers or employees of the Coast Guard, Customs, and Fisheries may be directed to attend as witnesses and to produce such available records and files or certified copies thereof as may be produced compatibly with the public interest and as may be considered essential to the prosecution in Canada of any violation of the provisions of the Convention or any Canadian law for the enforcement thereof when requested by the appropriate Canadian authorities in the manner prescribed in article V of the convention to suppress smuggling concluded between the United States and Canada on June 6, 1924 (44 Stat. (pt. 3), 2097).

SEC. 6. (a) Any person violating any provision of section 3 of this act upon conviction shall be fined not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 or be imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

(b) The cargo of halibut of every vessel employed in any manner in connection with the violation of any provision of section 3 of this act shall be forfeited; upon a second violation of the provisions of section 3 of this act, every such vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, and stores may be forfeited and the cargo of halibut of every such vessel shall be forfeited; and, upon a third or subsequent violation of the provisions of section 3 of this act, every such vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, cargo, and stores shall be forfeited.

(c) All provisions of law relating to the seizure, judicial forfeiture, and condemnation of a vessel for violation of the customs laws, the disposition of such vessel or the proceeds from the sale thereof, and the remission or mitigation of such forfeitures shall apply to seizures and forfeitures incurred, or alleged to have been incurred, under the provisions of this act, insofar as such provisions of law are applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act: Provided, That except as provided in section 5 hereof all rights, powers, and duties conferred or imposed by this act upon any officer or employee of the Treasury Department shall, for the purposes of this act, be exercised or performed by the Secretary of Commerce or by such persons as he may designate.

SEC. 7. Any person violating section 4 of this act shall be subject to a penalty of $50 for each such violation. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and empowered to mitigate or remit any such penalty in the manner prescribed by law for the mitigation or remission of penalties for violation of the navigation laws.

SEC. 8. None of the prohibitions contained in this act shall apply to the Commission or its agents when engaged in any scientific investigation.

SEC. 9. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce are authorized to make such joint rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 10. This act shall take effect on the date of exchange of ratifications of the Convention signed by the United States of America and Canada on January 29, 1937, for the preservation of the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea, unless such date shall be prior to the date of approval of this act, in which case it shall take effect immediately.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 6149) were laid on the table.

INSTRUCTIONS TO JURIES IN FEDERAL COURTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4721, relative to pleading and practice in civil and criminal causes in the district courts of continental United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the trial of any case, civil or criminal, before a jury, in any district court of continental United States, or in any other Federal court of the continental United States, authorized to try cases with the aid of a jury, the practice and procedure in such courts, including the granting of instructions to the jury, shall be the same as is followed in the State courts of the State in which such trial may be had.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That upon the trial of any case, civil or criminal, before a jury, in any district court of continental United States, or in any other Federal court of the continental United States, authorized to try cases with the aid of a jury, the form, manner, and time of giving and granting instructions to the jury shall be governed by the law and practice in the State courts of the State in which such trial may be had, and the judge shall make no comment upon the weight, sufficiency, or credibility of the evidence or any part thereof, or upon the character, appearance, demeanor, or credibility of any witness or party, unless such comment is authorized in trials of such cases by the law and practice in the State courts of the State where such trial is had."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment for the purpose of asking the author of the bill if consideration has been given to the wording on page 2, line 9. As I understand the purpose of the bill, it is to make the rules concerning the charging of juries in district courts the same as the rules in the State courts.

Mr. RAMSAY. That is right.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Would it not be better language and more understandable if the words "unless such", on page 2, line 9, were stricken out and the words "except as" substituted?

Mr. RAMSAY. The gentleman's suggestion is agreeable to me.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 9, strike out the words "unless such" and insert in lieu thereof "except as."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title of the bill was amended to read: "A bill relative to granting and giving instructions in civil and criminal cases in the district courts of continental United States."

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF INAUGURATION OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AS FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 366, providing for the preparation and completion of plans for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as first President of the United States and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries to participate therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

COMMEMORATIVE 50-CENT PIECES OF OPENING OF GOLDEN GATE BRIDGE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4087, to reduce by 100,000 the number of 50-cent pieces authorized to be coined in celebration of the opening of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge, and to authorize the coinage of not to exceed 100,000 50-cent pieces in celebration of the opening of the Golden Gate Bridge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in celebration of the opening of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge", approved June 26, 1936, is amended by striking out the words "two hundred thousand silver 50-cent pieces" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred thousand silver 50-cent pieces."

SEC. 2. In celebration of the opening of the Golden Gate Bridge, San Francisco, Calif., there shall be coined at a mint of the United States, to be designated by the Director of the Mint, not to exceed 100,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and composition, and of a special appropriate single design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the necessary dies and other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 3. The coins herein authorized shall bear the date 1937, irrespective of the year in which they are minted or issued, shall be legal tender in any payment to the amount of their face value, and shall be issued only upon the request of the Bank of America, upon payment by it of the par value of such coins, but not less than 25,000 such coins shall be issued to it at any one time, and no such coins shall be issued after the expiration of 1 year after the date of enactment of this act. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by such bank, and the net proceeds shall be used by it in defraying the expenses incidental and appropriate to the celebration of such event.

SEC. 4. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same, regulating and guarding the process of coinage, providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins, for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting, for the security of the coins, or for any other purposes, whether such laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein authorized.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one."

Page 2, line 20, after the word "bank", insert a comma and the words "subject to the approval of the Director of the Mint."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMISSION TO THE UNITED STATES AND EXTENSION OF NATURALIZATION PRIVILEGES TO ALIEN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6176, to admit to the United States and to extend naturalization privileges to alien veterans of the World War.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) as used in this act, the term "alien veterans" means an individual, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States at any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918, who is now an alien not ineligible to citizenship but does not include (1) any individual at any time during such period or thereafter separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions, (2) any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform, or (3) any alien at any time during such period or thereafter discharged from the military or naval forces on account of his alienage.

(b) Terms defined in the Immigration Act of 1924 shall, when used in this act, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act.

SEC. 2. An alien veteran shall for the purposes of the Immigration Act of 1924 be considered as a nonquota immigrant, but shall be subject to all the other provisions of that act and of the immigration laws, except that—

(a) He shall not be subject to the head tax imposed by section 2 of the Immigration Act of 1917;

(b) He shall not be required to pay any fee under section 2 or section 7 of the Immigration Act of 1924;

(c) If otherwise admissible, he shall not be excluded under section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917, unless excluded under the provisions of that section relating to—

(1) Persons afflicted with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, except tuberculosis in any form;

(2) Polygamy;

(3) Prostitutes, procurers, or other like immoral persons;

(4) Contract laborers;

(5) Persons previously deported; and

(6) Persons convicted of crime.

SEC. 3. The unmarried child under 18 years of age, the wife, or the husband, of an alien veteran shall, for the purposes of the Immigration Act of 1924, be considered as a nonquota immigrant when accompanying or following within 6 months to join him, but shall be subject to all the other provisions of that act and of the immigration laws.

SEC. 4. The foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to any alien unless the immigration visa is issued to him before the expiration of 1 year after the enactment of this act.

SEC. 5. An alien veteran admitted to the United States under this act shall not be subject to deportation on the ground that he has become a public charge.

SEC. 6. Nothing in the immigration laws shall be construed as subjecting any person to a fine for bringing to a port of the United States an alien veteran who is admissible under the terms if this act, even though such alien would be subject to exclusion if this act had not been enacted.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, line 10, strike out "1 year" and insert "2 years."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to admit to the United States certain alien veterans of the World War."

NATURALIZATION OF CERTAIN ALIEN SPOUSES OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6607, to provide for the naturalization of certain alien spouses of citizens of the United States, and to validate the naturalization of certain persons.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman who introduced this bill, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], to explain the bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I may say that in 1934 an act was passed amending the so-called Cable Act, and an interpretation was given to the amendment uniform in all courts except two of our circuit courts and the District Court of the District of Columbia. The latter court differs with the others and this act is simply to clarify the law in order to make uniform the application of the amendment. The purpose of the amendment is to remove discrimination as between husbands and wives.

Mr. BARDEN. I am wondering why the Department of Justice, the Department of State, or some other department, was not informed about this matter and asked for a report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I may say that the bill was drawn at the suggestion of and with the help of the Labor Department, which Department submitted a memorandum. One of their members testified before the committee at the time and stated it was desirable to accomplish this purpose.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, there is no report available. However, I will withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any alien who, prior to 12 o'clock noon, eastern standard time, May 24, 1934, and after September 21, 1922, married a citizen of the United States, or any alien who was married prior to 12 o'clock noon, eastern standard time, May 24, 1934, to a spouse who was naturalized during such period and during the existence of the marital relation may, if eligible to naturalization, be naturalized upon full and complete compliance with all requirements of the naturalization laws, with the following exceptions:

(a) No declaration of intention shall be required.

(b) In lieu of the 5-year period of residence within the United States, and the 6 months' period of residence in the county where the petitioner resided at the time of filing the petition, the petitioner shall have resided continuously in the United States, Hawaii, Alaska, or Puerto Rico for at least 1 year immediately preceding the filing of the petition.

SEC. 2. Any alien who, after 12 o'clock noon, eastern standard time, May 24, 1934, has married or shall hereafter marry a citizen of the United States, or any alien whose husband or wife was naturalized after such date and during the existence of the marital relation or shall hereafter be so naturalized may, if eligible to naturalization, be naturalized upon full and complete compliance with all requirements of the naturalization laws, with the following exceptions:

(a) No declaration of intention shall be required.

(b) In lieu of the 5-year period of residence within the United States, and the 6 months' period of residence in the county where the petitioner resided at the time of filing the petition, the petitioner shall have resided continuously in the United States, Hawaii, Alaska, or Puerto Rico for at least 3 years immediately preceding the filing of the petition.

SEC. 3. The naturalization of any women since 12 o'clock noon, eastern standard time, May 24, 1934, by any naturalization court of competent jurisdiction, upon proof of marriage to a citizen or the naturalization of her husband and proof of 1 year's residence in the United States is hereby validated only so far as relates to the period of residence required to be proved by such person under the naturalization laws.

SEC. 4. The naturalization of any male person after 12 o'clock noon, eastern standard time, May 24, 1934, by any naturalization court of competent jurisdiction, upon proof of marriage to a citizen of the United States after September 21, 1922, and prior to 12 o'clock noon, eastern standard time, May 24, 1934, or the naturalization during such period of his wife, and upon proof of 3 years' residence in the United States, is hereby validated only so far as relates to the period of residence required to be proved by such person under the naturalization laws and the omission by such person to make a declaration of intention.

SEC. 5. The act of September 22, 1922 (42 Stat. 1021), as amended, and the act of May 24, 1934 (48 Stat. 926), are amended from and after the effective date of this act to the extent provided in this act and not otherwise.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUSPENSION OF ANNUAL ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 187, providing for the suspension of annual assessment work on mining claims held by location in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill would suspend the annual assessment work on all mining claims in the United States during the year beginning at 12 o'clock, July 1, 1936, and ending at 12 o'clock, July 1, 1937, 9 days from the present time. I notice the reason why this bill has been reported out by the committee at this late time is to keep faith with those who have filed their claims but were not given notice that the policy of the Congress of suspending assessment work would be discontinued. The suspension has been approved each year since 1932.

I also notice that the committee has agreed that any further attempt to waive the annual assessment work will not be considered. I think we may consider therefore that notice is given to those holding claims upon which the assessments have been suspended that we stop right here the policy of continuing these suspensions.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan I sincerely hope he will not insist upon his objection for the reason that many of the owners of small mining claims have relied upon the passage of this law. They have had no notice otherwise, and the result is they have not done their assessment work.

The policy of the suspension of the assessment work was necessary on account of the depression we have been going through. Many of the people who have had these mining claims are in the same condition now as they were then. If we do not pass this act now many of the people who own these claims would lose them and the claims would be jumped, so to speak, by other parties and it would work an injustice to the miners of our western country, particularly Montana.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. This bill is for the protection of the prospector who goes out in the hills with his burro or has gone out into the wilderness with that useful, stoical, little Asiatic beast as his sole companion, to search out the treasures of the mountains and make them available to the Nation. It is not a bill for the protection of the big mining companies. There is a provision which safeguards only a few claims for each hard-pressed individual. We have only 9 days in which to enact this legislation. While we do not expect to extend this again, I do feel we have a moral duty to offer this last-minute relief. For this reason I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Permit me to say to the gentleman that there are a great many prospectors and miners of extremely limited financial means throughout the country who, in order to support themselves and families, have had to work in other capacities or apply their resources for living purposes. Many are on relief. These men in many instances have been working their claims for years and have a large investment in time and money tied up in these claims, and now have neither resources nor time element to hold their titles. Claims in many portions of the West are in the mountain regions in the snow country, which will make it impossible at this late date to perform their assessment work. At this late date for Congress to refuse to grant them the relief afforded through this bill that they fully expected to be enacted into law would do them a great injustice. Many have a life savings in their mining claims and have worked for years in an endeavor to build up and contribute to the mining industry of this country. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to call attention to the exact wording here:

Notwithstanding the report of the Department, the committee recommends the passage of the bill, because prospectors were not put on notice that the practice of granting moratoriums from year to year would be discontinued. The committee agreed that any further attempt to waive the annual assessment work or payment will not be considered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand if this bill is passed it may be considered by the prospectors that this is the last time we will extend this right?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. It seems to me it is important that it be understood at this time so that they will be on notice during the coming year.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] that as one who asked for the passage of this bill I have no quarrel with the ultimatum served by the Committee on Mines and Mining. I realize that the Government has exercised extraordinary forbearance in the matter of suspending this annual assessment work so many years in succession, and I shall not be among those who may be here in the future pressing such legislation. But the gentleman himself has stated the present urgent situation when he said that, after the expiration of 9 days, without the passage of this bill, all mining claims that are now suspending assessment work under the law will be forfeited. They should be given another year to get their houses in order, and I hope the gentleman will not press his objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which requires on each mining claim located, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed or improvements aggregating such amount to be made each year, be, and the same is hereby, suspended as to all mining claims in the United States during the year beginning at 12 o'clock meridian July 1, 1936, and ending at 12 o'clock meridian July 1, 1937: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply in the case of any claimant not entitled to exemption from the payment of a Federal income tax for the taxable year 1936: Provided further, That every claimant of any such mining claim, in order to obtain the benefits of this act, shall file, or cause to be filed, in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, on or before 12 o'clock meridian July 1, 1937, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this act, which notice shall state that the claimant, or claimants, were entitled to exemption from the payment of a Federal income tax for the taxable year 1936: Provided further, That such suspension of assessment work shall not apply to more than 6 lode-mining claims held by the same person, nor to more than 12 lode-mining claims held by the same partnership, association, or corporation: And provided further, That such suspension of assessment work shall not apply to more than 6 placer-mining claims not to exceed 120 acres (in all) held by the same person, nor to more than 12 placer-mining claims not to exceed 240 acres (in all) held by the same partnership, association, or corporation.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FORMER EMPLOYEES OF THE FEDERAL SUBSISTENCE HOMESTEAD CORPORATIONS

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call Calendar No. 264.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3058) for the relief of former employees of the Federal Subsistence Homestead Corporations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right to object and asked that this bill go to the foot of the call only for the purpose of getting some information on it. I stated at that time I should like to know what corporations were owned entirely by the Subsistence Homesteads Corporations, and how much money there was involved in the differences between the salaries of the employees of these corporations then and at the present time.

Mr. COLMER. Is this H. R. 4740?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No. This is H. R. 3058, which provides that where persons have been employed by any corporation, all of the stock of which was owned by the Federal Subsistence Homesteads Corporations of Delaware, and have been transferred to a position in the Department of the Interior, they shall be reimbursed for the difference between their salaries with the corporation from which they came and the salaries paid in a like class in the department where they are now working. What I particularly wanted to know was, What are the names of these corporations the entire stock of which was owned by the Subsistence Homesteads Corporations?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot give the gentleman that specific information. There were a number of these corporations organized for the purpose of carrying out the Subsistence Homesteads program. Among them was one at Richmond, in my own State.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman I think that information should be in the RECORD in order that we may have the information and have some idea as to how much is involved.

Mr. COLMER. As to how many corporations there were?

Mr. WOLCOTT. As to the names of the corporations, the entire stock of which was owned by the Subsistence Homesteads Corporations, from which these employees were transferred to the Subsistence Homesteads Corporations, or any other department.

Mr. COLMER. As I have stated, I cannot give the gentleman that information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. In view of the fact we do not have the information before us, and until it is available, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This concludes the call of the calendar with respect to the bills eligible for consideration today.

FEDERAL SURPLUS COMMODITIES CORPORATION

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to Consent Calendar No. 300, the bill (S. 2439) to extend the time for purchase and distribution of surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes and to continue the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan asked that this bill be passed over when we were considering it a few minutes ago. I have since been informed that the present act will expire July 1, and that this Corporation at present is rendering a very valuable service in the potato belt, which includes my district in North Carolina, and is expected to move farther north. It has rendered very, very valuable service to the State of Florida in the citrus fruit section and to the dairy industry. In view of these facts, I thought the gentleman from Michigan would like to withdraw his objection to the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman I consider this a very important bill. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is a Delaware corporation, organized, as I understand it, primarily to carry out the intent of clause 2 of section 32 of the act approved August 24, 1924, which seeks to encourage domestic consumption of commodities or products by diverting them by the payment of benefits or indemnities or by other means from the normal channels of trade and commerce.

A very serious question is also involved in this bill, which may be subject to a point of order, of whether the funds appropriated by Congress to the Secretary of Agriculture may be diverted and transferred to a private corporation without a reappropriation of such funds. If this constitutes a reappropriation of the funds, it may be subject to a point of order, the Committee on Agriculture not being a committee which has the authority under our rules to appropriate money or recommend the appropriation of money.

There are so many points in this bill that I think it should be considered by the House at a time when we would have a chance to discuss it more fully than we have today. This is why I asked that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BARDEN. At the time the gentleman made the request I was not informed of just the status of the Corporation. I may say that it is one organization which, I understand, spent only approximately 10 percent of the funds available to it out of the last appropriation and has rendered invaluable service to sections such as the citrus-fruit section of Florida, the dairy industry, and Irish-potato growers.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not doubt that it is true, because I understand the Corporation takes the surplus agricultural commodities and distributes them to the poor in the States, which is a very worthy undertaking.

Mr. BARDEN. We are just experiencing a bad potato situation now in North Carolina.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In that particular, also, I call the attention of the House to the fact that we on this side of the aisle have been belabored with criticism of the Farm Board since 1932. Your President's election was in part based on his opposition to the Farm Board.

Mr. BARDEN. I do not care to get into that argument at this time. We are talking about the Surplus Commodities Corporation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Commodity Credit Corporation is doing exactly the same work now that the Farm Board was set up to do in the Hoover administration.

Mr. BARDEN. I disagree with the gentleman on that. I think if the gentleman will investigate, he will find his statement is entirely unjustified.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, we should consider this bill more thoroughly in the House.

Mr. BOILEAU. Many people who are interested in the dairy problem confronting this country are of the opinion more benefit has been derived by the dairy industry of the gentleman's State and my State through the operations of this agency than all the other programs put together. I have personally received communications and requests from those who are interested in dairying to support this legislation. I hope the gentleman will not ultimately force the House to delay its consideration.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman I think this bill is one of the best sounding boards to show what this Administration is doing in my State and the gentleman's State of all that has come before us, and this is the reason we want time to talk about it. I doubt not that if the bill is considered on the floor and there is time for it, I will take the floor and say what I have already said, that I think in all probability this is a pretty good set-up. However, I am surprised nobody from the Committee on Appropriations, which has always been so jealous of its jurisdiction, has raised the point of order I suggested awhile ago. Merely for the purpose of protecting the integrity of one of our greatest committees I want to give further consideration to this bill, and determine if it is not one, perhaps, for the Committee on Appropriations to consider as well as the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BOILEAU. I may say to the gentleman that the committee had hearings, which, while not extensive, were sufficient, and at the request of several Republican members of the committee we had additional hearings, at which time I felt every member of the committee was satisfied the bill should be passed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no doubt that all that the gentleman has said, and all that all the gentlemen here have said, is true, but I think we should be given an opportunity to express ourselves on the bill; and I may add that probably I would be one who would express himself as favorable to a continuation of the Federal Surplus Commodity Corporation, but I am not so sure I am in favor of transferring funds appropriated to the Department of Agriculture to a private corporation without some discussion on this floor by which the fact is generally known and recorded that that is what we are doing. I may say now that I think this Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is doing a wonderfully fine work, but I think we should either make appropriations directly to it or know most definitely we are transferring these funds from the Department of Agriculture to this Corporation to do the same thing which we have been so often criticized for trying to do under the Farm Board. I do not hold any brief for the old Farm Board, but I do want to stop you gentlemen from criticizing the Republican administration for setting up the Farm Board and then trying to prevent us from criticizing your administration for setting up similar agencies to do the same thing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina to return to the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to returning to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BOILEAU. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against consideration of the bill——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make a point of order against the bill because it is not before the House.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then I object to the present consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

THE LATE HONORABLE FRANKLIN W. FORT

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow I announce to the membership of the House the death of our former colleague, Franklin W. Fort, who served in this House as a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

During his service he took an active part in the proceedings of the House. He rendered outstanding and distinguished service to the congressional district he represented and to the country at large. He always gave careful, studious, and serious consideration to every problem that came before the House for action. He never treated any matter lightly.

When he had made a decision he was zealous in upholding the principle involved. His ability and honesty of purpose were recognized by all and gained for him the respect and confidence of his colleagues.

Nor are we unmindful of all the splendid qualities of heart and mind he possessed, and the friendly disposition that made for him a host of enduring friends in this House, on both sides of the aisle who, today, mourn his passing away.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 7519) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, as amended.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

PART I

That the act of August 29, 1935, entitled "An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes", be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"DEFINITIONS

"SECTION 1. For the purposes of this act—

"(a) The term 'employer' means any carrier (as defined in subsection (m) of this section), and any company which is directly or indirectly owned or controlled by one or more such carriers or under common control therewith, and which operates any equipment or facility or performs any service (except trucking service, casual service, and the casual operation of equipment or facilities) in connection with the transportation of passengers or property by railroad, or the receipt, delivery, elevation, transfer in transit, refrigeration or icing, storage, or handling of property transported by railroad, and any receiver, trustee, or other individual or body, judicial or otherwise, when in the possession of the property or operating all or any part of the business of any such employer: Provided, however, That the term 'employer' shall not include any street, interurban, or suburban electric railway, unless such railway is operating as a part of a general steam-railroad system of transportation, but shall not exclude any part of the general steam-railroad system of transportation now or hereafter operated by any other motive power. The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed upon request of the Board, or upon complaint of any party interested, to determine after hearing whether any line operated by electric power falls within the terms of this proviso. The term 'employer' shall also include railroad associations, traffic associations, tariff bureaus, demurrage bureaus, weighing and inspection bureaus, collection agencies and other associations, bureaus, agencies, or organizations controlled and maintained wholly or principally by two or more employers as hereinbefore defined and engaged in the performance of services in connection with or incidental to railroad transportation; and railway labor organizations, national in scope, which have been or may be organized in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and their State and national legislative committees and their general committees and their insurance departments and their local lodges and divisions, established pursuant to the constitution and bylaws of such organizations.

"(b) The term 'employee' means (1) any individual in the service of one or more employers for compensation, (2) any individual who is in the employment relation to one or more employers, and (3) an employee representative. The term 'employee' shall include an employee of a local lodge or division defined as an employer in subsection (a) only if he was in the service of or in the employment relation to a carrier on or after the enactment date. The term 'employee representative' means any officer or official representative of a railway labor organization other than a labor organization included in the term 'employer' as defined in section 1 (a) who before or after the enactment date was in the service of an employer as defined in section 1 (a) and who is duly authorized and designated to represent employees in accordance with the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and any individual who is regularly assigned to or regularly employed by such officer or official representative in connection with the duties of his office.

"(c) An individual is in the service of an employer whether his service is rendered within or without the United States if he is subject to the continuing authority of the employer to supervise and direct the manner of rendition of his service, which service he renders for compensation: Provided, however, That an individual shall be deemed to be in the service of an employer not conducting the principal part of its business in the United States only when he is rendering service to it in the United States.

"(d) An individual is in the employment relation to an employer if he is on furlough, subject to call for service within or outside the United States and ready and willing to serve, or on leave of absence, or absent on account of sickness or disability; all in accordance with the established rules and practices in effect on the employer: Provided, however, That an individual shall not be deemed to have been on the enactment date in the employment relation to an employer not conducting the principal part of its business in the United States unless during the last pay-roll period in which he rendered service to it prior to the enactment date, he rendered service to it in the United States.

"(e) The term 'United States', when used in a geographical sense, means the States, Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

"(f) The term 'years of service' shall mean the number of years an individual as an employee shall have rendered service to one or more employers for compensation or received remuneration for time lost, and shall be computed in accordance with the provisions of section 3 (b): Provided, however, That where service prior to the enactment date may be included in the computation of years of service as provided in subdivision (1) of section 3 (b), it may be included as to service rendered to a person which was on the enactment date an employer, irrespective of whether, at the time such service was rendered, such person was an employer; and it may also be included as to service rendered to any express company, sleeping-car company, or carrier by railroad which was a predecessor of a company which, on the enactment date, was a carrier as defined in subsection (m), irrespective of whether, at the time such service was rendered to such predecessor, it was an employer. Twelve calendar months, consecutive or otherwise, in each of which an employee has rendered such service or received such wages for time lost, shall constitute a year of service. An ultimate fraction of 6 months or more shall be taken as 1 year. An ultimate fraction of less than 6 months shall be taken at its actual value.

"(g) The term 'annuity' means a monthly sum which is payable on the 1st day of each calendar month for the accrual during the preceding calendar month.

"(h) The term 'compensation' means any form of money remuneration earned by an individual for services rendered as an employee to one or more employers, or as an employee representative, including remuneration paid for time lost as an employee, but remuneration paid for time lost shall be deemed earned in the month in which such time is lost. Such term does not include tips, or the voluntary payment by an employer, without deduction from the remuneration of the employee, of any tax now or hereafter imposed with respect to the compensation of such employee.

"(i) The term 'Board' means the Railroad Retirement Board.

"(j) The term 'enactment date' means the 29th day of August 1935.

"(k) The term 'company' includes corporations, associations, and joint-stock companies.

"(l) The term 'employee' includes an officer of an employer.

"(m) The term 'carrier' means an express company, sleeping-car company, or carrier by railroad, subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act.

"(n) The term 'person' means an individual, a partnership, an association, a joint-stock company, or a corporation.

"ANNUITIES

"SEC. 2. (a) The following-described individuals, if they shall have been employees on or after the enactment date, shall, subject to the conditions set forth in subsections (b), (c), and (d), be eligible for annuities after they shall have ceased to render compensated service to any person, whether or not an employer as defined in section 1 (a) (but with the right to engage in other employment to the extent not prohibited by subsection (d)):

"1. Individuals who on or after the enactment date shall be 65 years of age or over.

"2. Individuals who on or after the enactment date shall be 60 years of age or over and (a) either have completed 30 years of service or (b) have become totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire, but the annuity of such individuals shall be reduced one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that they are under age 65 when the annuity begins to accrue.

"3. Individuals, without regard to age, who on or after the enactment date are totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire and shall have completed 30 years of service.

"Such satisfactory proof of the permanent total disability and of the continuance of such disability until age 65 shall be made from time to time as may be prescribed by the Board. If the individual fails to comply with the requirements prescribed by the Board as to proof of the disability or the continuance of the disability until age 65, his right to an annuity under subdivision 2 or subdivision 3 of this subsection by reason of such disability shall, except for good cause shown to the Board, cease, but without prejudice to his rights under subdivisions 1 or 2 (a) of this subsection. If, prior to attaining age 65, such an individual recovers and is no longer disabled for regular employment for hire, his annuity shall cease upon the last day of the month in which he so recovers and if after such recovery the individual is granted an annuity under subdivisions 1 or 2 (a) of this subsection, the amount of such annuity shall be reduced on an actuarial basis to be determined by the Board so as to compensate for the annuity previously received under this subdivision.

"(b) An annuity shall be paid only if the applicant shall have relinquished such rights as he may have to return to the service of an employer and of the person by whom he was last employed; but this requirement shall not apply to the individuals mentioned in subdivision 2 (b) and subdivision 3 of subsection (a) prior to attaining age 65.

"(c) An annuity shall begin to accrue as of a date to be specified in a written application (to be made in such manner and form as may be prescribed by the Board and to be signed by the individual entitled thereto), but—

"(1) not before the date following the last day of compensated service of the applicant, and

"(2) not more than 60 days before the filing of the application.

"(d) No annuity shall be paid with respect to any month in which an individual in receipt of an annuity hereunder shall render compensated service to an employer or to the last person by whom he was employed prior to the date on which the annuity began to accrue. Individuals receiving annuities shall report to the Board immediately all such compensated service.

"COMPUTATION OF ANNUITIES

"SEC. 3. (a) The annuity shall be computed by multiplying an individual's 'years of service' by the following percentages of his 'monthly compensation': 2 percent of the first $50; 1½ percent of the next $100; and 1 percent of the next $150.

"(b) The 'years of service' of an individual shall be determined as follows:

"(1) In the case of an individual who was an employee on the enactment date, the years of service shall include all his service subsequent to December 31, 1936, and if the total number of such years is less than 30, then the years of service shall also include his service prior to January 1, 1937, but not so as to make his total years of service exceed 30: Provided, however, That with respect to any such individual who rendered service to any employer after January 1, 1937, and who on the enactment date was not an employee of an employer conducting the principal part of its business in the United States no greater proportion of his service rendered prior to January 1, 1937, shall be included in his 'years of service' than the proportion which his total compensation (including compensation in any month in excess of $300) for service after January 1, 1937, rendered anywhere to an employer conducting the principal part of its business in the United States or rendered in the United States to any other employer bears to his total compensation (including compensation in any month in excess of $300) for service rendered anywhere to an employer after January 1, 1937.

"(2) In all other cases, the years of service shall include only the service subsequent to December 31, 1936.

"(3) Where the years of service include only part of the service prior to January 1, 1937, the part included shall be taken in reverse order beginning with the last calendar month of such service.

"(4) In no case shall the years of service include any service rendered after June 30, 1937, by an individual who is 65 years of age or over, except for the purpose of computing his monthly compensation as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

"(c) The 'monthly compensation' shall be the average compensation earned by an employee in calendar months included in his 'years of service', except (1) that with respect to service prior to January 1, 1937, the monthly compensation shall be the average compensation earned by an employee in calendar months included in his years of service in the years 1924–31, and (2) that where service in the period 1924–31 is, in the judgment of the Board, insufficient to constitute a fair and equitable basis for determining the monthly compensation for service prior to January 1, 1937, the Board shall determine the monthly compensation for such service in such manner as in its judgment shall be just and equitable. If the employee earned compensation after June 30, 1937, and after the last day of the month in which he attained age 65, such compensation shall be disregarded if the result of taking such compensation into account would be to diminish his annuity. In computing the monthly compensation, no part of any month's compensation in excess of $300 shall be recognized.

"(d) The annuity of an individual who shall have been an employee representative shall be determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if the employee organization by which he shall have been employed were an employer.

"(e) If the individual was an employee when he attained age 65 and has completed 20 years of service, the minimum annuity payable to him shall be $40 per month: Provided, however, That if the monthly compensation on which his annuity is based is less than $50, his annuity shall be 80 percent of such monthly compensation, except that if such 80 percent is less than $20, the annuity shall be $20 or the same amount as the monthly compensation, whichever is less. In no case shall the value of the annuity be less than the value of the additional old-age benefit he would receive under title II of the Social Security Act if his service as an employee after December 31, 1936, were included in the term 'employment' as defined therein.

"(f) Annuity payments due an individual but not yet paid at death shall be paid to a surviving spouse if such spouse is entitled to an annuity under an election made pursuant to the provisions of section 4; otherwise they shall be paid to the same individual or individuals who may be entitled to receive any death benefit that may be payable under the provisions of section 5.

"(g) No annuity shall accrue with respect to the calendar month in which an annuitant dies.

"(h) After an annuity has begun to accrue, it shall not be subject to recomputation on account of service rendered thereafter to an employer, except as provided in subdivision 3 of section 2 (a).

"(i) If an annuity is less than $2.50, it may, in the discretion of the Board, be paid quarterly or in a lump sum equal to its commuted value as determined by the Board.

"JOINT AND SURVIVOR ANNUITY

"SEC. 4. An individual whose annuity shall not have begun to accrue may elect prior to January 1, 1938, or at least 5 years before the date on which his annuity begins to accrue, or upon furnishing proof of health satisfactory to the Board, to have the value of his annuity apply to the payment of a reduced annuity to him during life and an annuity after his death to his spouse during life equal to, or 75 percent of, or 50 percent of such reduced annuity. The amounts of the two annuities shall be such that their combined actuarial value as determined by the Board shall be the same as the actuarial value of the single-life annuity to which the individual would otherwise be entitled. Such election shall be irrevocable, except that it shall become inoperative if the individual or the spouse dies before the annuity begins to accrue or if the individual's marriage is dissolved or if the individual shall be granted an annuity under subdivision 3 of section 2 (a): Provided, however, That the individual may, if his marriage is dissolved before the date his annuity begins to accrue, or if his annuity under subdivision 3 of section 2 (a) ceases because of failure to make the required proof of disability, make a new election under the conditions stated in the first sentence of this subsection. The annuity of a spouse under this subsection shall begin to accrue on the first day of the calendar month in which the death of the individual occurs.

"DEATH BENEFITS

"SEC. 5. The following benefits shall be paid with respect to the death of individuals who were employees after December 31, 1936:

"(a) If the deceased should not be survived by a widow or widower who is entitled to an annuity under an election made pursuant to the provisions of section 4, there shall be paid to such person or persons as the deceased may have designated by a writing filed with the Board prior to his death, or if there be no designation, to the legal representative of the deceased, the amount, if any, by which 4 percent of the aggregate compensation earned by the deceased after December 31, 1936, exceeds the sum of the total of the annuity payments actually made to the deceased plus the total of the annuity payments due the deceased but not yet paid at death. If the person or persons designated to receive the death benefit do not survive the deceased, the death benefit shall be paid to the legal representative of the deceased.

"(b) If the deceased should be survived by a widow or widower entitled to an annuity under an election made pursuant to the provisions of section 4, there shall, on the death of the widow or widower, be paid to such person or persons as the deceased may have designated by a writing filed with the Board prior to his death, or if there be no designation, to the legal representative of the deceased, the amount, if any, by which 4 percent of the aggregate compensation earned by the deceased after December 31, 1936, exceeds the sum of the total of the annuity payments actually made to the deceased plus the total of the annuity payments actually made to the widow or widower under an election made pursuant to the provisions of section 4 and under the provisions of section 3 (f), plus the total of the annuity payments due the widow or widower but not yet paid at death. If the person or persons designated to receive the death benefit do not survive the widow or widower, the death benefit shall be paid to the legal representative of the deceased.

"In computing the aggregate compensation for the purpose of this section, no part of any month's earnings in excess of $300 shall be recognized.

"PENSION TO INDIVIDUALS ON PENSION OR GRATUITY ROLLS OF EMPLOYERS

"SEC. 6. (a) Beginning July 1, 1937, each individual then on the pension or gratuity roll of an employer by reason of his employment who was on such roll on March 1, 1937, shall be paid on July 1, 1937, and on the 1st day of each calendar month thereafter during his life, a pension at the same rate as the pension or gratuity granted to him by the employer without diminution by reason of a general reduction or readjustment made subsequent to December 31, 1930, and applicable to pensioners of the employer: Provided, however, That no pension payable under this section shall exceed $120 monthly; And provided further, That no individual on the pension or gratuity roll of an employer not conducting the principal part of its business in the United States shall be paid a pension under this section unless, in the judgment of the Board, he was, on March 1, 1937, carried on the pension or gratuity roll as a United States pensioner.

"(b) No individual covered by this section who was on July 1, 1937, eligible for an annuity under this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, based in whole or in part on service rendered prior to January 1, 1937, shall receive a pension payment under this section subsequent to the payment due on October 1, 1937, or due on the 1st day of the month in which the application for an annuity of such individual has been awarded and certified by the Board, whichever of the two dates is earlier. The annuity claims of such individuals who receive pension payments under this section shall be adjudicated in the same manner and with the same effect as if no pension payments had been made: Provided, however, That no such individual shall be entitled to receive both a pension under this section and an annuity under this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, and in the event pension payments have been made to any such individual in any month in which such individual is entitled to an annuity under this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, the difference between the amounts paid as pensions and the amounts due as annuities shall be adjusted in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Board may deem just and reasonable.

"(c) The pension paid under this section shall not be considered to be in substitution for that part of the pension or gratuity from the employer which is in excess of a pension or gratuity at the rate of $120 a month.

"SEC. 7. Nothing in this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 shall be taken as restricting or discouraging payment by employers to retired employees of pensions or gratuities in addition to the annuities or pensions paid to such employees under such acts, nor shall such acts be taken as terminating any trust heretofore created for the payment of such pensions or gratuities.

"CONCLUSIVENESS OF RETURNS OF COMPENSATION AND OF FAILURE TO MAKE RETURNS OF COMPENSATION

"SEC. 8. Employers shall file with the Board, in such manner and form and at such times as the Board by rules and regulations may prescribe, returns under oath of monthly compensation of employees, and, if the Board shall so require, shall furnish employees with statements of their monthly compensation as reported to the Board. Any such return shall be conclusive as to the amount of compensation earned by an employee during each month covered by the return, and the fact that no return was made of the compensation claimed to be earned by an employee during a particular calendar month shall be taken as conclusive that no compensation was earned by such employee during that month, unless the error in the amount of compensation returned in the one case, or the failure to make return of the compensation in the other case, is called to the attention of the Board within 4 years after the last date on which return of the compensation was required to be made.

"ERRONEOUS PAYMENTS

"SEC. 9. (a) If the Board finds that at any time more or less than the correct amount of any annuity or pension has theretofore been paid to any individual under this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, then, under regulations made by the Board, proper adjustments shall be made in connection with subsequent payments under such acts to the same individual.

"(b) There shall be no recovery of payments of annuities, death benefits, or pensions from any person who, in the judgment of the Board, is without fault and if, in the judgment of the Board, such recovery would be against equity and good conscience. No disbursing officer shall be held liable for any amount paid by him to any person where the recovery of such amount is waived under this section.

"RETIREMENT BOARD

"Personnel

"SEC. 10. (a) There is hereby established as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government a Railroad Retirement Board, to be composed of three members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each member shall hold office for a term of 5 years, except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of the term and the terms of office of the members first taking office after the enactment date shall expire, as designated by the President, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 3 years, and one at the end of 4 years after the enactment date. One member shall be appointed from recommendations made by representatives of the employees and one member shall be appointed from recommendations made by representatives of carriers, in both cases as the President shall direct, so as to provide representation on the Board satisfactory to the largest number, respectively, of employees and carriers concerned. One member, who shall be the chairman of the Board, shall be appointed initially for a term of 2 years without recommendation by either carriers or employees and shall not be in the employment of or be pecuniarily or otherwise interested in any employer or organization of employees. Vacancies in the Board shall not impair the powers or affect the duties of the Board or of the remaining members of the Board, of whom a majority of those in office shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Each of said members shall receive a salary of $10,000 per year, together with necessary traveling expenses and subsistence expenses, or per-diem allowance in lieu thereof, while away from the principal office of the Board on official duties.

"Duties

"(b) 1. The Board shall have and exercise all the duties and powers necessary to administer this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935. The Board shall take such steps as may be necessary to enforce such acts and make awards and certify payments. Decisions by the Board upon issues of law and fact relating to pensions, annuities, or death benefits shall not be subject to review by any other administrative or accounting officer, agent, or employee of the United States.

"2. If the Board finds that an applicant is entitled to an annuity under the provisions of this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, then the Board shall make an award fixing the amount of the annuity and shall certify the payment thereof as hereinafter provided; otherwise the application shall be denied.

"3. The Board shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the name and address of each individual entitled to receive a payment, the amount of such payment, and the time at which it should be made, and the Secretary of the Treasury through the Division of Disbursements of the Treasury Department, and prior to audit by the General Accounting Office, shall make payment in accordance with the certification by the Board.

"4. The Board shall establish and promulgate rules and regulations to provide for the adjustment of all controversial matters arising in the administration of such acts, with power as a Board or through any member or designated subordinate thereof to require and compel the attendance of witnesses, administer oaths, take testimony, and make all necessary investigations in any matter involving annuities or other payments, and shall maintain such offices, provide such equipment, furnishings, supplies, services, and facilities, and employ such individuals and provide for their compensation and expenses as may be necessary for the proper discharge of its functions. In the employment of such individuals under the civil-service laws and rules the Board shall give preference over all others to individuals who have had experience in railroad service, if, in the judgment of the Board, they possess the qualifications necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of the positions to which they are to be appointed. All rules, regulations, or decisions of the Board shall require the approval of at least two members, except as provided in subdivision 5 of this subsection, and they shall be entered upon the records of the Board, which shall be a public record. Notice of a decision of the Board, or of an employee thereof, shall be communicated to the applicant in writing within 30 days after such decision shall have been made. The Board shall gather, keep, compile, and publish in convenient form such records and data as may be necessary to assure proper administration of such acts. The Board shall have power to require all employers and employees and any officer, board, commission, or other agency of the United States to furnish such information and records as shall be necessary for the administration of such acts. The several district courts of the United States and the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction upon suit by the Board to compel obedience to any order of the Board issued pursuant to this section. The orders, writs, and processes of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia in such suits may run and be served anywhere in the United States. The Board shall make an annual report to the President of the United States to be submitted to Congress. Witnesses summoned before the Board shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

"5. The Board is authorized to delegate to any of its employees the power to make decisions on applications for annuities or death benefits in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Board: Provided, however, That any person aggrieved by a decision so made shall have the right to appeal to the Board.

"COURT JURISDICTION

"SEC. 11. An employee or other person aggrieved may apply to the district court of any district wherein the Board may have established an office or to the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia to compel the Board (1) to set aside an action or decision of the Board claimed to be in violation of a legal right of the applicant or (2) to take action or to make a decision necessary for the enforcement of a legal right of the applicant. Such a court shall have jurisdiction to entertain such application and to grant appropriate relief. The decision of the Board with respect to an annuity, pension, or death benefit shall not be subject to review by any court unless suit is commenced within 1 year after the decision shall have been entered upon the records of the Board and communicated to the person claiming the annuity, pension, or death benefit. The jurisdiction herein specifically conferred upon the Federal courts shall not be held exclusive of any jurisdiction otherwise possessed by such courts to entertain actions at law or suits in equity in aid of the enforcement of rights or obligations arising under the provisions of this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935.

"EXEMPTION

"SEC. 12. No annuity or pension payment shall be assignable or be subject to any tax or to garnishment, attachment, or other legal process under any circumstances whatsoever, nor shall the payment thereof be anticipated.

"PENALTIES

"SEC. 13. Any officer or agent of an employer, as the word 'employer' is hereinbefore defined, or any employee acting in his own behalf, or any individual whether or not of the character hereinbefore defined, who shall willfully fail or refuse to make any report or furnish any information required, in accordance with the provisions of section 10 (b) 4, by the Board in the administration of this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, or who shall knowingly make or cause to be made any false or fraudulent statement or report when a statement or report is required to be made for the purpose of such acts, or who shall knowingly make or aid in making any false or fraudulent statement or claim for the purpose of causing an award or payment under such acts, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year.

"SEPARABILITY

"SEC. 14. If any provision of this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, should be held invalid, the remainder of such act, or the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACCOUNT

"SEC. 15. (a) There is hereby created an account in the Treasury of the United States to be known as the Railroad Retirement Account. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the account for each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, as an annual premium an amount sufficient, with a reasonable margin for contingencies, to provide for the payment of all annuities, pensions, and death benefits in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935. Such amount shall be based on such tables of mortality as the Railroad Retirement Board shall from time to time adopt, and on an interest rate of 3 percent per annum compounded annually. The Railroad Retirement Board shall submit annually to the Bureau of the Budget an estimate of the appropriation to be made to the account.

"(b) At the request and direction of the Board, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the amounts credited to the account as, in the judgment of the Board, is not immediately required for the payment of annuities, pensions, and death benefits in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. For such purpose such obligations may be acquired on original issue at par or by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price. The purposes for which obligations of the United States may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are hereby extended to authorize the issuance at par of special obligations exclusively to the account. Such special obligations shall bear interest at the rate of 3 percent per annum. Obligations other than such special obligations may be acquired for the account only on such terms as to provide an investment yield of not less than 3 percent per annum. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and dispose of obligations in the account if it shall be in the interest of the account so to do. Any obligations acquired by the account, except special obligations issued exclusively to the account, may be sold at the market price. Special obligations issued exclusively to the account shall, at the request of the Board, be redeemed at par plus accrued interest. All amounts credited to the account shall be available for the payment of all annuities, pensions, and death benefits in accordance with the provisions of this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935.

"(c) The Board is hereby authorized and directed to select two actuaries, one from recommendations made by representatives of employees and the other from recommendations made by representatives of carriers. These actuaries, along with a third who shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be known as the Actuarial Advisory Committee with respect to the Railroad Retirement Account. The committee shall examine the actuarial reports and estimates made by the Railroad Retirement Board and shall have authority to recommend to the Board such changes in actuarial methods as they may deem necessary. The compensation of the members of the committee of actuaries, exclusive of the member designated by the Secretary, shall be fixed by the Board on a per-diem basis.

"(d) The Board shall include in its annual report a statement of the status and the operations of the Railroad Retirement Account. At intervals not longer than 3 years the Board shall make an estimate of the liabilities created by this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 and shall include such estimate in its annual report. Such report shall also contain an estimate of the reduction in liabilities under title II of the Social Security Act arising as a result of the maintenance of this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935.

"APPROPRIATION FOR ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

"SEC. 16. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time such sums as may be necessary to provide for the expenses of the Board in administering the provisions of this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935.

"SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

"SEC. 17. The term 'employment', as defined in subsection (b) of section 210 of title II of the Social Security Act, shall not include service performed by an individual as an employee as defined in section 1 (b).

"FREE TRANSPORTATION

"SEC. 18. It shall not be unlawful for carriers by railroad subject to this act to furnish free transportation to individuals receiving annuities or pensions under this act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 in the same manner as such transportation is furnished to employees in their service."

PART II

SECTION 201. The act entitled "An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935, as in force prior to its amendment by part I of this act, may be cited as the "Railroad Retirement Act of 1935"; and such act, as amended by part I of this act, may be cited as the "Railroad Retirement Act of 1937."

SEC. 202. The claims of individuals (and the claims of spouses and next of kin of such individuals) who, prior to the date of the enactment of this act, relinquished all rights to return to the service of a carrier as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 or ceased to be employee representatives as defined therein, and became eligible for annuities under such act, shall be adjudicated by the Board in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been enacted: Provided, however, That with respect to any such claims no reduction shall be made in any annuity certified after the date of the enactment of this act because of continuance in service after age 65: And provided further, That service rendered prior to August 29, 1935, to a company which on that date was a carrier as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, shall be included in the service period in connection with any annuity certified in whole or in part by the Board after the date of the enactment of this act, irrespective of whether at the time such service was rendered such company was a carrier as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935; and service rendered prior to August 29, 1935, to any express company, sleeping-car company, or carrier by railroad which was a predecessor of a company which on that date was a carrier as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, shall also be included in the service period in connection with any annuity certified in whole or in part by the Board after the date of the enactment of this act, irrespective of whether at the time such service was rendered such predecessor was a carrier as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935: And provided further, That annuity payments due an individual under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 but not yet paid at death shall be paid to a surviving spouse if such spouse is entitled to an annuity under an election made pursuant to the provisions of section 5 of such act; otherwise they shall be paid to such person or persons as the deceased may have designated by a writing filed with the Board prior to his death, or if there be no designation, to the legal representative of the deceased.

SEC. 203. Any individual who, prior to the date of the enactment of this act, relinquished all rights to return to the service of a carrier as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 or ceased to be an employee representative as defined in such act, and who is not eligible for an annuity under that act but who would have been eligible for an annuity under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 had such act been in force from and after August 29, 1935, shall have his right to an annuity adjudicated under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937: Provided, however, That no such annuity shall begin prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 204. The Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 shall continue in force and effect with respect to the rights of individuals granted annuities prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 205. The enactment of this act shall have no effect on the status, tenure of office, or compensation of the present members, officers, and employees of the Railroad Retirement Board; except that individuals who have had experience in railroad service shall be retained in the employ of the Board, whether or not qualified under the civil-service laws and rules, if in the judgment of the Board they possess the qualifications necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of the positions which they are holding.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, in 1934 the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] introduced a Railroad Retirement Act which Congress passed and which was subsequently held unconstitutional in the Supreme Court by a vote of 5 to 4.

In 1935 Congress passed another retirement act which was contested in the courts, but, so far, has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court.

In December 1936 the President suggested that railway management and the men in railway industry negotiate with a view of agreeing upon a railway retirement act.

Representatives of the 21 standard railway employees' organizations representing substantially all railway employees on class I railroads participated in the negotiations. Railway management representing 98½ percent of the total mileage of class 1 railways of the United States participated in the negotiations. Class 1 railroads, as the membership of the House is aware, embrace every railroad whose annual income is over $1,000,000.

Members of the Federal Railroad Retirement Board participated with representatives of the management and men in these conferences. Finally an agreement was reached, the substance of which was embodied in a bill brought before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House. As a result of the hearings and further consideration of that measure by our committee a number of changes were made which were approved of by these two groups and embodied in the bill now presented to the House.

This is the most far-reaching agreement ever entered into between capital and labor in this or any other country.

It is accomplished in noticeable contrast with the deplorable conflicts and strife now abroad in our country and sapping at its economic life.

This plan completely carried out would place one-half of its burden upon the employees and the other half upon the employers. The burden thus borne will include administrative expense of the Federal Government.

The legislation affects 1,150,000 employees in the service and is based on the pay roll of about $2,200,000,000.

I will not attempt to make a detailed analysis of the provisions of the bill but will roughly refer to some of its important features.

EMPLOYERS

Employers subject to the act are express companies, sleeping-car companies, rail carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, companies controlled by one or more of the employers in the transportation business or in railway service, and certain railroad and labor organizations having slightly less than 4,000 employees, which are also treated as employers in the bill.

EMPLOYEES

The employee is one in the service, for compensation, of an employer under the act. The relationship is one where the employee is subject to the direction and continued authority of the employer.

An important feature of the bill is a provision making those in "employment relation" subject to benefits under the bill. That term includes, outside of those actually working in the service of the employer, those who are not actually working but who are temporarily absent because of reductions in business or on account of sickness or disability or under furlough. Such persons might be entitled to an annuity at 65 years of age; or after 60 years of age without 30 years of service in case of permanent and total disability, or after 30 years of service.

These provisions will cover the cases of about 8,000 who were disabled on the enactment date, August 29, 1935.

Employees on carrier pension rolls on March 1, 1937, will be transferred and receive annuities after July 1, 1937. The annuity granted to such employees under this act will not exceed $120 per month. The remainder, if any, annuity in excess of that amount which they are now receiving will be paid by the carrier.

These pensioners are also to have restored any general reduction made in their pensions by the carriers since December 31, 1930.

ANNUITIES

Annuities are based on an employment relation on the enactment date, August 29, 1935; on an age of 65 years or over and on a voluntary surrender of the employment on which the annuity is based; also on a 60-year basis as above indicated.

This bill provides for no compulsory retirement. The existing law reduces annuity benefits by one-fifteenth for each year after the employee remains for service after 65 years of age. That restriction is removed from this bill. It was originally intended for the purpose of inducing men to leave employment after 65 years of age.

Annuities are computed on a basis of monthly compensation and years of employment.

July 1, 1937, is the controlling date for computing prior and subsequent service. Service prior to that date is computed so far as necessary to make up the 30 years required to qualify for an annuity. Full credit is given for all service subsequent to that date in computing an annuity.

The computation for an annuity includes increased compensation after 65 years of age, if any. The employee is not charged with lower compensation after that date in computing his annuity.

The average annuity received under this legislation will be slightly less than one-half of the compensation received by the employee while in the service.

RETIREMENT AGE

The employee acquires retirement rights at 60 years after 30 years of service; or when he becomes totally and permanently disabled, but subject to a deduction of one-fifteenth of the annuity for each year less than 65 years of age.

The average entrance of age of the present railway employee is 26 years. This rather high age of entrance is due to the fact that skill is required in so many branches of railway employment and to the further fact that to a large extent the nature of the work calls for men of mature judgment.

Generally, the railroads do not employ unexperienced persons after 35 years of age or experienced persons after 45 years of age.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

In 1929 class 1 railroads employed 1,600,000; in 1933 the number had decreased to 931,000, or 669,000 less than 4 years before. At the last report for 1937 there were 1,150,000 employees on these railroads. It is now estimated that a return to the business level of 1929 would require the employment of 1,400,000 employees, or 200,000 less than required in 1929. This decreased number would be due to more efficient and labor-saving methods adopted in the last 8 years.

COST OF PLAN

There are uncertainties as to the number who may become beneficiaries under this act; the age and amount to which they will be entitled when they apply. The best estimates available indicate that an appropriation of $118,250,000 will be required for the fiscal year 1938 and that the maximum appropriation required will be in 1950, $162,250,000.

For a good many years to come it is estimated the taxes received will largely exceed the necessary expenditures to carry the plan. Funds accumulated in excess of current requirements will develop a contingent reserve which, to a material degree, will lighten the load when disbursements reach their peak, about 1975.

It is estimated that the disbursements for 1938 will be $58,280,000, or $60,000,000 less than the receipts.

It is estimated by 1948 the disbursements will be $107,099,000, or over $50,000,000 less than receipts for that year.

By 1975 it is estimated the maximum annual expense will be reached amounting to $231,390,000.

It may be safely assumed that experience developed in the administration of this act will demonstrate the desirability of changes to adjust the plan The maintenance of a proper balance between receipts and disbursements will of necessity require adjustment from time to time. No doubt at least minor adjustments will be required as to the extent of liabilities or the amount of funds estimated to meet such liabilities. The general plan, however, seems to be on a sound basis. There is no reason to anticipate any such changes will be found necessary as to destroy the substantial features of the plan embodied in this legislation.

It is the belief of the committee that this act, and particularly its substantial features, will be held constitutional should the Supreme Court be called upon for its decision.

Friends of this legislation, in my judgment, need not particularly fear ultimate Court disposal of this problem.

The two great groups entering into agreement resulting in this legislation have agreed not to contest it. Other interested parties may possibly do so. The time may easily come when the Government or friends of the legislation will desire the certainty of a Supreme Court decision to finally define the rights and liabilities under this legislation.

COMMENDS COOPERATION OF MEN AND MANAGEMENT

This legislation is the most notable action taken for age-retirement benefits in private industry in the history of this country. It is expected legislation will, in effect, place the burden of maintaining the system directly upon the men and management whose agreement led to this legislation. Like all retirement systems however, the burden of its maintenance must ultimately reach the consumer. To the employer a retirement system is part of his labor cost which must in the main, be passed on to the consumer of his products or service. To the employee, his retirement benefit is an additional compensation. To the extent that he may contribute, it is in effect a savings account, or a premium for insurance of age benefits.

Students of retirement systems seem to agree they tend to reduce the current compensation of the employee, but to increase the ultimate reward of his employment. The payments he receives after retirement more than compensate for the decreased pay he receives during his employment.

The employee acquires an assurance against age and disabilities that tends to stabilize him from an economic standpoint and gives him an assurance for aid that should add to his comfort and happiness.

Probably no other class of employees in the country, engaged in private industry, can more readily be adjusted to a retirement system under the general plan of this bill than railway employees. Their employment is well graded and standardized, comparatively constant, with a comparatively limited number of employers who are always subject to public regulation.

The fixing of pay and benefits, as well as the employer pay roll, are comparatively easy of ascertainment as contrasted with most employment in private industry.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Most of our present private retirement systems are founded on labor cost and include increased pay or at least a different method of payment for labor performed. In this respect such systems must be contrasted with general old-age pensions based on age and need.

The greatest reason for old-age pensions is the humane reason; the need of protecting worthy people against poverty and misfortune against which they are unable to protect themselves. Generally speaking, the care of such persons cannot be based on assessment against pay rolls. The support of such a system is more equitably placed among the tax liabilities of the Nation, local, State, or Federal. Men and women do not need or deserve age pensions primarily on account of what they may have collected from pay rolls.

The burden of pensions to the aged must rest on the consumers of the country. Taxes of all kinds primarily add to the living cost of the Nation, and the consumers of the country pay the bill.

Consumer contributions and increasing compensation to limited groups increases costs to all consumers and give the benefits to limited groups of beneficiaries. All of the needy pay with our whole population, but only part of the needy are beneficiaries of the plan. This situation, with due regard to justice and equity, leads us to seek a more universal application of age-retirement benefits. In turn, we must seek a more universal and just distribution of the burden of age retirement.

I regard our social-security plan as transitory because it fails in a just distribution of both its burdens and its benefits. It is too limited in its benefited classes from a humane standpoint of need and too limited in applying its burdens. There is a sane and necessary balance that must be maintained between what the Nation would like to do and what it is practicable to do.

It is with hope that this act may be wisely administered with wholesome advantages to the Nation and that it may contribute toward a yet more widespread and equitable system of social security.

We submit this measure to the Members of Congress.

For those who may be interested in comparisons of this proposed law with the existing act I submit a more detailed explanation.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACTS OF 1937 AND 1935

The Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 differs in many points from the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935. Apart from minor changes in phraseology, these differences may be discussed under six headings:

First. The Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 has a broader coverage, both as to employers and employees, than the present act.

(a) All employees of American lines, wherever they may be, are employees under the act. For example, American lines operate extensively in Canada; employees of these American railroads in Canada would be covered by the act.

(b) Railroad labor organizations are now to be included as employers. While it had been thought that the present act embraces railroad traffic associations, bureaus, and similar organizations, the doubt has now been removed by specific inclusion of such organizations in definite terms.

(c) Under the present act employees include, among others, persons who are on furlough or leave of absence, subject to call for service and ready and willing to serve. Many railroad employees, most of them old, comply with all the parts of this definition except that, because of permanent and total physical disability, they are not now, and never will be, ready to serve. The bill would include such persons as employees.

Second. Requirements for the receipt of benefit have been changed.

(a) Under the bill an employee would be required to cease rendering compensated service to any person, whether an employer under the act or not, before he may become eligible to receive an annuity. At the present time an employee who leaves the railroad service may begin to receive his annuity even though he may be employed regularly in another industry. The new provision is fortified by another which specifies that the annuity shall cease if the annuitant renders compensated service to an employer as defined in the act, or to the last person by whom he was employed prior to the date on which the annuity begins to accrue.

(b) An annuity may be paid under the present act to an employee who has completed 30 years of service if he shall have been, after the enactment date, retired by a carrier on account of mental or physical disability. The bill will provide that the annuity is payable only if the employee is permanently and totally disabled for regular employment for hire.

(c) Under the present act an employee may begin to receive an annuity when under the age of 65, even though not disabled, provided he has completed 30 years of service, but the annuity is to be reduced at the rate of one-fifteenth for each year by which he is under 65 at the time of the first annuity payment. This means that annuities of this character may begin as early as 50 years and 1 month, although in such case the annuity would be reduced to almost nothing. Under the bill annuities of this class may not begin prior to age 60, at which time the reduction would be one-third.

(d) Persons who are permanently and totally disabled for regular employment for hire may, under the bill, be eligible for annuities, irrespective of the length of service, but with the provision that such annuity is to be reduced by one-fifteenth for each year by which the employee is under 65 when the annuity begins to accrue.

Third. Benefits have been changed in several respects.

There have been several changes which affect the amount of benefits. The benefit that is paid upon death has been changed both as to deaths for which compensation is paid and as to form, and finally a new benefit has been added.

(a) The first change affecting the amount of benefits is one which removes the limitation on creditability of future service. At the present time no annuity may be based on more than 30 years of service, irrespective of the length of the service period. This change in the bill will mean that in 1967 and thereafter annuities may be based on more than 30 years of service.

(b) Annuities based on prior service would not be paid under the bill to persons who are not employees on the date of enactment. Such persons will, of course, receive annuities based on all subsequent service. At the present time all persons who become employees may receive annuities based on both prior and future service.

(c) The reductions in annuities which are prescribed, except for officials, for employees over the age of 70, or over the age of 65, unless an agreement to continue in service is filed, have been removed. Under the present act these reductions in annuity have been at the rate of one-fifteenth for each year of continued service after the age of 65.

(d) In the event an employee is granted an annuity because of permanent and total disability and subsequently recovers, the annuity payable on retirement at the age of 65 or thereafter is to be reduced to take account of the payments made because of the disability. This is a new provision.

(e) Provision is made for a minimum annuity of $40 per month for persons who retire at the age of 65 or over, after 20 years or more of service, and whose average compensation on which the annuity is based is $60 or more. If such average compensation is less than $60, the annuity is to be 80 percent thereof, unless such 80 percent is less than $20, in which case the annuity is to be $20 or the average monthly compensation, whichever is less. Moreover, the annuity is not to be less than the additional amount which would be payable under title II of the Social Security Act if the employment under the retirement act were employment under title II of the former. No minimum is provided at the present time.

(f) Service after the age of 65 is to be disregarded in calculating annuities; except that if the compensation is such that it would increase the average which would be used to calculate the annuity at age 65, such compensation will be taken into account for the purpose of calculating the average.

(g) The death benefit is changed in two respects: First, instead of being payable only in respect of persons receiving or entitled to receive an annuity, it now becomes payable on the death of any person who has been an employee, and who has received compensation for service after December 31, 1936; second, instead of being one-half of the annuity which the deceased was receiving or entitled to receive, the benefit is to be 4 percent of the compensation, not in excess of $300 a month, for service on or after January 1, 1937.

(h) The present act instructs the Railroad Retirement Board to make a report as to the feasibility and practicability of substituting the provisions of the act for any existing provisions for the voluntary payment of pensions to employees not subject to the act. This provision has been deleted in the bill, and instead provision is made for the payment to persons now in receipt of voluntary pensions and gratuities of pensions equal to those granted by the employer, but without reduction caused by changes or adjustments of any plan after December 31, 1930.

Fourth. Railroad retirement account.

The present Railroad Retirement Act authorizes the appropriation of only such moneys from time to time as will be necessary to carry the act into effect. This provision has been understood to mean that every year there will be appropriated an amount necessary to pay the benefits currently due. Following the precedent of the Social Security Act, in language substantially the same, and having the same meaning, the new bill would create a reserve account to which there is authorized to be appropriated as annual premiums amounts "sufficient with a reasonable margin for contingencies to provide for the payment of all annuities, pensions, and death benefits, according to the provisions of this act and the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935."

It is not always possible to determine in advance (ordinarily, in fact, more than a year and a half in advance) how many deaths and retirements will take place. Consequently, unless there is a reserve to draw upon, it is possible that at some time embarrassing situations will arise because of unexpected drains on the appropriation. Moreover, it is clear that for a number of years there will be a strong tendency for benefit disbursements to rise. This rise will occur because of the inevitable increase in the number of employees who will attain retirement age and because of the fact that of any considerable number who do attain retirement age, some will survive for periods as long as 30 to 40 years. In view of this inescapable tendency for disbursements to rise, it is entirely reasonable and prudent that reserves be accumulated in anticipation thereof.

The amount of the appropriations to be made will depend on experience as it develops under the act. There will necessarily be involved the ages of retirement and entry into service; the rates of mortality, permanent and total disability, withdrawal from the industry, change in compensation by age and length of service, and so on. Since the appropriation contemplates the accumulation of reserves in anticipation of future payments, the basis of premiums must necessarily be recomputed from time to time in order to make allowance for variations between experience and estimates. Increases and decreases in the volume of employment and general decreases and increases in wage levels, all rising out of variations in general economic conditions, must also be taken into account from time to time as they occur. The provision for contingencies is intended to safeguard against sudden changes in these factors. All these factors, of course, have a bearing not only on the amounts to be appropriated but the amounts to be disbursed for benefits.

Fifth. Free transportation.

Section 1, subsection 7, of the Interstate Commerce Act prohibits the giving of free transportation except to certain enumerated classes of people. Among the excepted classes are employees and their families. The term "employees" is defined as including "furloughed, pensioned, and superannuated employees." It has been clear that the railroads could grant free transportation to employees on their own pension rolls, and those who might be superannuated even though not on such rolls. It is not clear whether there is any change in the status of such employees when they do not receive pensions from their employers, but rather annuities or pensions from the United States Treasury. It is clear that Congress, in passing the present Railroad Retirement Act, did not intend to preclude the giving of free transportation to employees receiving benefits from the United States Treasury rather than under the private pension systems of the carriers. The new bill would make it clear that the carriers may continue to furnish free transportation to employees in receipt of annuities or pensions under the Railroad Retirement Act in the same manner as they furnish free transportation to employees in the service.

Sixth. Administrative changes.

A considerable number of administrative changes would be effected by the bill. Some of the more important of these follow:

(a) The status of American employees of Canadian lines would be clarified.

(b) All service with an employer who was such on the enactment date is to be made creditable, removing the necessity for laborious searching into past records to determine the former status with respect to the Interstate Commerce Act. Until recent years, and particularly before 1908, the Interstate Commerce Commission did not make definite rulings as to the applicability of the act in many instances. At the present time the Retirement Board must attempt to determine whether a company was subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, for example, in 1887 or in 1900, as the case may be. The Board at the present time must also fix the date at which the act did become applicable.

(c) The definition of "compensation" would be clarified by making it clear that the earning of compensation rather than its receipt is what is significant, and by specifically excluding tips and taxes levied against the employees' compensation but paid by the employer, without deduction from the employees' pay.

(d) The Board is to be given discretion in fixing a compensation base for prior service where there was no service, or insufficient service, in the 8-year period 1924–1931, which will normally form the base for the determination of prior service compensation.

(e) No greater amount of prior service will need to be taken into account beyond that necessary to bring the total service up to 30 years. At the present time it is necessary to secure service records as far back as 1887, even though no more than 30 years will be used as the multiplier in computing the annuity.

(f) Returns as to compensation are to be made incontestable after 4 years. The Board is authorized to require that employers shall furnish to their employees statements of their monthly compensation as reported to the Board.

(g) The payment of death benefits is facilitated by providing for the designation of beneficiaries. At the present time all death settlements must be made under the laws of the several States.

(h) The provisions for the election of the joint and survivor annuity form, in lieu of the life annuity, is changed so as to preclude adverse selection and increased cost but without impairing the element of protection.

(i) Recovery of payments may be waived if such recovery would defeat the purposes of the benefits otherwise authorized or would be against equity and good conscience. Authority is given to the Board to adjust erroneous payments in subsequent payments to the same individual.

(j) The Board is to be authorized to delegate to any of its employees the power to make decisions on applications for annuities or death benefits in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Board.

(k) The district courts of the United States and the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia would have jurisdiction, upon suit by the Board, to compel obedience to such orders, and it would also provide that the orders, returns, and processes of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia may run and be served anywhere in the United States. At present, though the act provides that the Board shall have the power to require carriers and employees of the United States to furnish information and records needed for the administration of the act, it contains no provision pursuant to which the Board can compel obedience to its orders.

(l) Suits against the Board by a person aggrieved by a decision are barred unless filed within 1 year after the decision has been entered upon the records of the Board and communicated to the claimant.

(m) An actuarial advisory committee is to be created to examine the actuarial reports and valuations made by the Retirement Board.

(n) The exclusion of employments covered by the act from the provisions of title II of the Social Security Act would be clarified.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the Railroad Retirement Act now under consideration deserves the unanimous support of the Membership of the House. It provides a safe and sound system of retirement pensions or annuities for all who are employed, in any capacity, by the railroad systems of the country, and represents another outstanding achievement of the cooperative effort of management and men in the Nation's largest industry, to improve working conditions.

The circumstances under which this legislation is presented to the House are of such a character as to deserve special emphasis. Never during my experience in this House has legislation of such widespread importance been presented under more favorable conditions. First and foremost is the fact that it represents absolute and complete unanimity of thought and desire between management and men. There is no feature of this bill that presents any controversy or disagreement as between these two parties. Every provision has the support of both without any reservation upon the part of either. It represents a united effort to produce legislation that will be satisfactory and mutually beneficial, and comes before the House with the united support of railroad management and all the standard brotherhoods.

At a time when the Nation is sorely distressed with industrial turmoil, arising from conflicting interests, this action of management and men in the railroad industry comes as an assurance of what can be accomplished when both parties are willing to sit down together in a cooperative spirit that recognizes the respective rights and obligations of the other. And it is particularly gratifying to realize that the results have been attained without leaving that feeling of bitterness which so often accompanies agreements where either one side or the other feels that they have been driven to conclusions with which they are not in full accord. The absence of any such feeling in this instance is a splendid testimonial of the sincerity, fairness, and consideration with which the representatives of management and men approached and solved the many complex problems that demanded settlement in order that a satisfactory plan of retirement might result.

It is also worthy of note that the same spirit of cooperation that has been shown by both of the interested parties to the retirement plan was also shown by the membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. At no time was there any appearance of partisan division nor divisions of any other character.

There was at all times a manifest desire upon the part of members of both political parties to make this worth-while legislation as perfect as it was humanly possible to do. It was realized that the problems, legal, financial, and economical, were of a character that required the most thoughtful consideration. In all of the discussions within the committee the underlying and controlling thought was to produce a plan that would be secure and prove beneficial to those who through the years would come within its provisions. And it is pleasing to report that this bill comes before the House with the unanimous support of the entire membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

This background of cooperative effort, first, upon the part of all those engaged in the railroad industry, management and men, and, secondly, by the membership of the committee, that has labored diligently and thoughtfully to provide worth-while legislation, creates, it seems to me, an obligation upon the part of the membership of this House to support wholeheartedly the result that has been reached.

There is, in my opinion, a very definite duty upon the part of the House to give approval to this type of legislation. No one will doubt that it is mutually beneficial to all parties, the railroad company, the railroad workers, and the traveling public. It provides a sense of security for old age that will create a satisfied state of mind upon the part of the workers. It removes doubt and uncertainty as to the future when the worker, because of advanced age can no longer measure up to the high standards that railroading, today, requires in all of its branches. A satisfied mind, wherein worry and fear are removed, enables the worker to give attention to his duties without disturbing influences that otherwise result, thereby promoting the element of safety for the traveling public, and giving to the company a quality of service that cannot be measured in dollars and cents.

The present bill is the third to be presented to Congress dealing with railroad retirement legislation. The first act was signed by the President on June 27, 1934. It was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court on May 6, 1935. Another act to take its place was passed and became law on August 29, 1935. This act is now and has been in litigation since it became effective. Because of this fact it has been impossible for the Railroad Retirement Board to function effectively. This condition prompted the President to suggest to representatives of railroad labor organizations and railroad management that an effort be made to work out between them a retirement plan which would be mutually satisfactory.

In accordance with the suggestion of the President, a committee was appointed by the Association of American Railroads to confer with a committee appointed by the Railway Labor Executives Association, representing the employees. As a result of the conferences held by these two representative groups a plan of retirement was agreed upon and is embodied in amendments to the existing law. The bill now before the House (H. R. 7519) represents the plan as agreed upon by the carriers and their employees and approved by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce after careful study and extensive hearings. The enactment of this bill in its present form has been agreed upon by all the interested parties. Furthermore, it has been agreed by each of the parties that they will upon its enactment support and defend its provisions and cease further litigation of the present act to which this pending bill is an amendment. Consequently, the enactment of this bill will bring to a satisfactory conclusion all pending legislation, clear up all doubts and uncertainties, and provide a safe, sound, and highly beneficial plan of retirement for all railroad and affiliated employees.

For many years some of the railroads of the country have voluntarily maintained pension systems for the benefit of those who are retired from active service. In some instances the pension benefits have been highly satisfactory, but, it is also true that in some other instances the system in effect was not entirely satisfactory to the employees. And on some railroads there was no pension or retirement benefits whatsoever for retired employees. This bill will create a national system, uniform throughout the country, and eliminate the ever-present fear that a voluntary plan might, because of economic conditions, be discontinued by the company or the payments greatly reduced at any time. With the enactment of this bill into law, the basis for any such fears in the future will be removed. It makes permanent and sure that which was formerly uncertain or doubtful.

The enactment of this legislation will represent one of the most forward and progressive steps ever taken by any single industry.

I hope that the approval of this bill by the House will also indicate to industry in general the favorable results that can be attained when the spirit of cooperation prevails in the settlement of problems affecting the welfare of those who labor.

It is a privilege to have had a part in the enactment of this legislation that will mean so much to those who through a period of years have rendered faithful, efficient, and conscientious service in the different branches of railroad transportation. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that it is necessary to take this bill up under suspension of the rules, because I realize it is not possible to amend it and also that there is not sufficient time to properly discuss it. My purpose in obtaining this time is to clear up what I believe to be a misunderstanding which exists relative to the agreement entered into between the carriers and the representatives of the employees. There has been agreement entered into, but it is being misconstrued that that agreement pertains to all railroad legislation, and that the rest of the railroad legislation now pending before the Congress is to be thrown into the scrap heap and that the retirement act is to be passed, and no more of the brotherhood legislative program. I challenge any Member of the House to contradict my statement that that agreement has nothing to do with any other legislation than the retirement act, which is before us today, and this retirement act stands on its own feet, because it has merit and because it is generally recognized by the railroad carriers and the employees that men who work on the railroads should be retired when they become 65 years of age. In order to substantiate that argument I call attention to the testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House in respect to it. I quote the testimony of Mr. Harrison, who appeared on behalf of the 21 railroad labor organizations, including the brotherhoods, and who spoke officially for them at that time. He was asked a question by Mr. BOREN:

> Does this agreement between the carriers and the employees' representatives in any way affect other legislation that might be introduced as regards railroad labor or railroads?
> Mr. HARRISON. I am glad you asked that question. This agreement we made with the railroads stands on its own bottom. It has no relation whatever to any other legislation. There were no promises made by representatives of labor that anything would be forgotten because of this agreement, nor did the railroads make any promises that they would even give up anything because of this agreement. It stands by itself on its own bottom.

Then I quote from the testimony of Mr. Fletcher, general counsel of the railroads of the United States. In his testimony, in referring to the agreement between the railroad carriers and the employees' representatives relative to this legislation, he said:

> I rise, therefore, mainly for the purpose of asserting what has been said by Mr. Harrison as to the complete agreement between the parties with reference to this measure and largely to emphasize and reiterate what he said in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, the above-mentioned agreement has nothing to do with other pending railroad legislation, and I realize that the argument is being made in the cloak rooms and elsewhere in this Chamber from mouth to ear, that this agreement between the railroad carriers and the employees' representatives pertains to other legislation than this retirement act, and it does not, and at this time if anyone has that argument in mind, if anyone believes that there are such agreements entered into, now is the time for him to speak up, and not when we are considering other railroad legislation in the committee or on the floor of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FRED M. VINSON].

Mr. FRED M. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to see what can be accomplished when patriotic men sit around the same table and work toward the same objective. It should be pointed out in respect to the history of social legislation, particularly old-age retirement benefits, that the railroad boys have blazed the trail. They are the pioneers in this character of legislation. I think we would be remiss in our duty if we did not pay compliment to the old war horse BOB CROSSER, our colleague from Ohio, who has done such valiant service in this cause. [Applause.]

In my connection with this legislation, it has been a most heartening sight to observe the conduct of George Harrison, and Judge Charles Hay, of St. Louis, on behalf of the Railroad Brothedhood, and Mr. Pelley, and Judge Fletcher, of the Railroad Executives, working out this far-reaching humanitarian problem. It is a splendid job, and we all can look forward to increased pleasure in having participated in it. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in its origin this piece of legislation is probably without precedent in the history of American legislation. As has been already stated, it is the result of an agreement in writing between the railroad systems of the United States and their 1,200,000 employees. This is their bill, written by them. More extraordinary than that, however, is the fact that not only the pensions to be paid under this law but the cost of the administration of the law will be borne by self-imposed assessments upon the railway companies and the railway employees.

All the facts may not appear in this bill, but in my opinion, since the Social Security Act decision by the Supreme Court, they could be made to appear, and this great forward step in social security in a great industry could now be safely taken in one act instead of two acts.

This measure may not be entirely satisfactory to all the railroad employees of the country. It is not in every respect entirely satisfactory to me. It may require future revision. But to those of the employees who are not satisfied with one feature or another of the bill, I want to remind them that the railroad companies of the country voluntarily agreed with the employees on this measure after the railroad companies had been virtually assured by the Supreme Court that no compulsory pension act for railroad employees could stand the test of the Constitution. This measure had been agreed upon before the rendition of the Social Security Act decision, and when it seemed certain that the contributory old-age pension title and the unemployment insurance title of that act would be held unconstitutional, and when it seemed certain that the fate of the first Railroad Retirement Act awaited the second act.

In order that the foregoing statements may not rest simply on my word, I want to quote three very short paragraphs from the able dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Hughes in the first Railroad Retirement Act case.

The Chief Justice opened his dissenting opinion with these statements:

> The gravest aspect of the decision is that it does not rest simply upon a condemnation of particular features of the Railroad Retirement Act but denies to Congress the power to pass any compulsory pension act for railroad employees.
> That is a conclusion of such serious and far-reaching importance that it overshadows all other questions raised by the act. Indeed, it makes their discussion superfluous.

Now, while this measure is produced and agreed upon by the railway companies and their employees, it will nonetheless be a compulsory pension law when it gets on the statute books. That is why I say that when it was entered into it was known by the contracting parties that in all human probability it could not be made binding without their consent. Moreover, it indicates on the part of the contracting parties an apprehension that the second Railroad Retirement Act would be held unconstitutional.

Now, with the fact accomplished, I want to repeat a statement made by me before it was accomplished, which appears in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 437. I quote:

> If, as is now reported, the railroad companies are getting together with their million-odd employees to accept and establish the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act and dismiss the pending cases, doing this in the face of the Court's virtual assurance that it will relieve them from the law, full credit should be given the railway managements for such an enlightened and humane step.

Viewed in the right light, perhaps the history of this legislation has been for the best. It has shown us that one of the major industries of the country and their employees, numbering now about 1,200,000, could get together and settle the question for themselves—a major question, materially affecting the public welfare, in a field embracing all industries and all groups and every man, woman, and child in the country. It should prove an encouragement to other industries and groups falling under the Social Security Act to go forward and make an earnest effort to fulfill the provisions of the law. If our mechanized processes contribute to unemployment and create premature superannuation—and I claim that they do—and we have millions in each class, society owes them a living in decency and comfort. These laws are intended to meet that requirement, and this self-imposed act should help to show the way.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake in my brief time to itemize and explain the provisions of this bill or to make a comparison with the act now pending in the courts. That has been done by the sponsor of the bill, the able gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], who has the unique distinction of sponsoring the railroad pension acts of the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses and now the proposed act of the Seventy-fifth Congress.

Having said so much for the bill, I feel at liberty to point out one unsatisfactory feature. It is in its failure to carry a compulsory retirement provision when the employee reaches the retirement age. I think I know as well as any Member here the genesis of railroad pension legislation. As motive power and other equipment have been improved and vastly increased in capacity, the number of operatives required on the railways of the country has become less and less. I can remember when there was no agitation for train-limit legislation. None was needed. No trains were of sufficient length to raise the question. I know of my own knowledge that one engine and train crew are today moving over the railways of the country a tonnage which 40 years ago would have required four and five crews. So it is the same in transportation as in other lines of industry—the machine displaces the man. In railroading this development has all but destroyed hope for advancement. When I was a young man a locomotive fireman could reasonably hope to become an engineer in 3, 4, or 5 years. Now locomotive firemen on the railways of this country are being superannuated without ever reaching promotion. What is true of this particular class is true of others in the railway service, and this was true before the depression.

Pensions for railway employees have had two objectives, pensions for men when they reached the retirement age, and jobs for younger men. To reach the employment objective the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 carries not an arbitrary compulsory retirement but a penalty for continuing in the service after retirement age is reached of one-fifteenth of the annuity for each year the employee continues in service after being entitled to retire on a pension. I regret that that provision is not in this bill and in view of its authorship perhaps cannot now be put in the bill and certainly cannot be put in in the House under the suspension rule. The absence of this provision, in my opinion, will be the most unsatisfactory feature of the law to great numbers of railway employees. I have no doubt if submitted to a referendum compulsory retirement would be approved. As it is, the measure will, of course, provide no new employment.

The very fact that the absence of compulsory retirement will reduce the load thirty-five to forty million dollars a year indicates the failure of the measure to produce new employment. Compulsory retirement in the railway service at the retirement age would be nothing new. Nearly all the railways of the country have their own pension systems, which are noncontributory by the employees. And I know of none without a compulsory retirement age, and I have in mind the principal railroad system in my State, in which every man, from general manager to section hand, is given a retirement notice on his seventieth birthday.

However, a great thing is being accomplished in this bill, and greater even in its origin than in its accomplishment. Should it develop that the feature which I have mentioned calls for consideration at a future time, it will no doubt be given. I offended a constituent recently by writing him that if I agreed with the President on most points, I could not help him or the situation either by throwing rocks at him over something on which I did not agree with him. Judging from his answer my constituent got the point, even if I lost a vote. I feel the same about this measure. To say that I am pleased with it is expressing it mildly. My attitude toward many industrial practices in this country during my lifetime does not rate me as a very friendly critic, but that does not limit me in expressing my approval of such a forward step and very great step.

One more thought. I know labor. I am familiar with its movements, and while, as the result of some experience and long observation, I support all legislative measures tending to protect labor and better its condition, the conviction has abided with me for many years that the self-government of labor in its relationships to industry, so far as practicable, is preferable to a Government paternalism, no matter how kind. The conduct of labor's industrial relationships through organizations of its own choosing gives labor a capacity for handling its own affairs and a sense of discipline and responsibility which it can never realize in any other way. Government should have laws for the protection of labor and should set up standards, but under this protection and within these standards we will produce a higher and more self-reliant type of citizenship through collective bargaining than if everything is written in the law. This bill embodies a notable achievement in that direction, and it sets an example worthy of emulation in other fields of industry in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as has been stated, this bill was worked out by representatives of the 21 brotherhoods, which include practically all of the employees of the railroads, and the representatives of the railroads, and it is recommended for passage by both of them. It is to take the place of the existing Railroad Retirement Act which was passed in 1935. It is agreed between the representatives of the railroads and the brotherhoods that they will not contest the constitutionality of this legislation, that they will not themselves bring any action to contest its constitutionality, and that they will use their influence against having anyone else bring such action. It is further understood that any suit or suits now pending in court to test the constitutionality of the existing railroad retirement law will be withdrawn.

Speaking generally, this legislation proposes to give an annuity to everyone in the employ of the railroads, from the chief executive down to the section hand. The maximum, however, which can be paid to any one person is $120 per month.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Does this bill make any provision for old employees who have worked for 25 or 30 years, who are not now actually employed by the railroad company?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. If they were in an "employment relation to an employer", as defined in the act, on August 29, 1935.

The House should know that this bill is to be accompanied by a companion bill to be reported by the Ways and Means Committee to raise the money with which to pay the annuities provided for in this bill. This bill on its face provides for the payment of the annuities out of the general fund of the Treasury, but it is anticipated that the Committee on Ways and Means will report, and I understand that that committee is in session at this very moment for the purpose of reporting a bill which will raise the money with which to meet the obligations incurred by the passage of this bill. The Treasury is to be reimbursed from moneys collected from the railroads and the employees themselves.

It is expected that this legislation will involve no additional drain upon the Treasury, but that the tax bill which the Committee on Ways and Means is about to report will raise sufficient funds with which to meet all obligations incurred by this legislation. As has been pointed out, there is no opposition to this bill on the part of the management of the railroads or on the part of the representatives of the 21 brotherhoods. It is a constructive piece of legislation and will provide security in their old age to the railway employees of the country. I congratulate all parties concerned in the successful culmination of years of earnest work and effort in the accomplishment of their objective in the passage of this legislation. At the same time I congratulate my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] upon the passage of legislation which has been so dear to his heart. This bill is due very largely to his loyalty to the cause and to his persistence and ability in advancing it at every opportunity.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does this bill in any way provide that employees working for a trucking company, where a railroad ownes a large percentage of the stock, will be covered, or is it restricted to rail employees only?

Mr. MAPES. It covers employees of subsidiary or any other companies which are controlled by the railroads.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Whether overland or by rail?

Mr. MAPES. Whether overland or by rail. In fact, it does not matter what business they may be engaged in so long as that business is "controlled" by a railroad. To give the whole picture I might add that there is a dispute between the representatives of the brotherhoods and the managements of the railroads as to what is meant by the term "controlled." They are agreed upon the language of the bill, but what is to be the interpretation of the term "controlled" is to be the subject of further negotiation and determination. It is a pleasure to support and to speak in behalf of this legislation so dear to the heart of every railroad man or woman.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield ½ minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER].

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I simply want to take this opportunity to assure the membership of the House that this measure was given the most sympathetic and careful consideration, not only by the subcommittee but by our full committee. I am hopeful that the House will follow the example of the committee and adopt it unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for several terms, during the entire time the subject of this legislation has been before us, I want to call especially to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding service and signal accomplishment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], who has consistently sponsored this legislation and successfully steered it through Congress in two previous sessions. One of the real privileges of service in this body is the opportunity of close association and the development of lasting friendships, which committee service more than in any other contact offers to the members. The gentleman from Ohio has been one of the ranking and admittedly one of the most able members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and during the trying days of the depression, during the last two terms of Congress, when the committee was under the leadership of the present distinguished floor leader, Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas, Mr. CROSSER, despite his physical handicap, rendered service of immeasurable value as he is now doing under the present leadership of the industrious and popular chairman, the gentleman from California, Mr. LEA. I am sure that the majority leader, should he have an opportunity in the brief period assigned for the debate on this bill to say something, will find an acknowledgment of Mr. CROSSER's service while he was chairman of the committee the uppermost thought in his mind.

The first legislation providing for retirement of railroad employees passed in 1934 in a form which I am frank to say, as I explained in the commmittee sessions, was of doubtful constitutionality. The Supreme Court later so declared by a closely divided Court and, in 1935, the second bill was passed. I believe that bill, now the subject of litigation before the Supreme Court, is constitutional, but I have some doubt of the constitutionality of the companion measure, which was the tax bill to provide the necessary revenue. With the hope that some of the apparent difficulties in the existing law—and there must be difficulties in legislation of this magnitude calling for frequent changes by Congress—can be eliminated and the further hope that this bill, coming to us as it does with railroad management and employees pretty much in agreement as to its provisions, will eliminate further litigation which complicates the administration of the entire measure, Mr. CROSSER presents the third measure and, I believe, the final solution of this important problem.

I have never known a man during my fairly long experience in the House who has sponsored with more fairness, intelligence, and industry than Mr. CROSSER has this and other railroad-labor legislation. As is known, more to the committee members than the House in general, I have seen fit to differ at times with his views on some of the legislation bearing his name, but those differences and discussions which have taken place between us have always ended in a greater enlightment of the legislation and a more satisfied feeling as to its intent. It must be a happy period in the long and capable career which Mr. CROSSER has enjoyed to find at this time the realization of one of the main ambitions of his legislative career, and this with practically the uninanimous support of his colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, there is not time to discuss the provisions of this bill but I commend to those interested the report of the committee and the remarks of Mr. CROSSER. My sole purpose in arising at this time is to give expression to the genuine feeling of regard and esteem I possess for the distinguished author of this bill and one of my colleagues on this great committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have before us H. R. 7519, known as the railroad workers' retirement bill. I am not a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that had under consideration and favorably reported this bill, but it has been stated that the committee was unanimous in its report, and we have also been told that this bill was unanimously agreed upon and its passage urged by the representatives of the 21 standard railroad labor organizations and approved by the representatives of the railroads.

I wish to commend the action of the railroad brotherhoods and railroad managements in presenting this bill to Congress, and I wish to express my appreciation for the unanimous action of this fine committee in approving the action of the railroad workers and management. And may I urge that the House of Representatives show the same fine spirit of cooperation and unanimity in passing this bill without a dissenting vote.

I have been identified with legislation affecting the railroads and railroad workers since 1919 and have had an opportunity to make a study of and compare American railroads and railroad workers with the railroads and workers of other countries. It can be said without fear of successful contradiction that American railroads are the finest and best in all the world and that the railroad workers of this country are the best trained, the most loyal, and most dependable, and can render the highest type and best service of any railroad workers on earth. A single American railroad worker can and does perform as much service as two or even five railroad workers in other countries of the world. American railroad workers receive the highest wages, have the shortest hours, and the best working conditions of any railroad workers.

And, by the way, passenger and freight rates are lower in this country than in any other country. Most of the railroads of other countries are owned and operated by the government. These comparisons, it would seem to me, should prove that in order to give good service and enjoy reasonable rates and pay good wages to the workers it is not necessary for the railroads to be owned and operated by the Government.

INTELLIGENT, DEPENDABLE, AND LOYAL

As a class the railroad workers of our country are intelligent, dependable, and loyal. They constitute a high type of patriotic American citizenship. They strive to own their own homes, they have business interests of their own, they show deep interest in schools and every other measure for the benefit and uplift of their respective communities. All in all, they constitute a great body of God-fearing, honest, law-abiding, patriotic citizens. They have always shown wisdom in the selection of their representatives. The men who head these great brotherhoods have the training, experience, and good judgment to fill with distinction key positions in industry and to occupy high places in the service of the Government. Many of them would make capable members of the President's Cabinet. Some years ago I had the honor to urge the appointment of one of the representatives of one of the great railroad brotherhoods, the Honorable William Doak, as a member of the President's Cabinet. He was appointed and served with great distinction in that high office. There are many others just as capable.

The railroad brotherhoods select as their leaders men of outstanding wisdom, experience, fairness, and high character. The railroad management of this country has in recent years shown a fine spirit of cooperation in dealing with their workers, and in this period of great strife it is most heartening indeed to see the representatives of 1,150,000 workers and the management of the American railroads sit down around a table together and work out a measure that each side considers fair to both. Neither side feels that it has overreached the other.

This bill amends the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, and while this measure may not be perfect, the representatives of the workers urged and had adopted in this amendment many features that will be, as I understand it, of great benefit to the workers, and it is a great improvement over the act of 1935. If in the operation of this amended retirement act it should be found that amendments are necessary, I have no doubt but what Congress will by appropriate legislation adopt them.

Through all the years the representatives of railroad workers have been not only reasonable and fair with the railroads, but they have also been reasonable and fair with Congress, and it is because of this attitude that measures backed by the representatives of the workers of the railroads have always found favor with Congress. The management and workers in industry might study the record of the railroad workers and the railroads with profit.

It has been hinted that the agreement as to this bill precludes action on other railroad measures urged by the representatives of the workers. I have not so understood it. The agreement, so far as I understand it, applies solely and only to this particular bill before us. I know so far as I am concerned that after speaking and voting for this bill, I shall feel free to support other measures that may appear to be just and necessary.

I cannot refrain from again commending the railroad management, the railroad workers, and the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for their fine contribution in bringing to us this splendid measure that we hope will greatly benefit the railroad workers and at the same time be fair and just to the railroads of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I may announce that the Committee on Ways and Means has already reported the tax bill to which I referred.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the committee and all those responsible for this bill—the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937. Regardless of minor changes or additional features that we might like to see included, I think we will all agree that this is a most constructive piece of legislation and that it should be passed with our hearty and enthusiastic endorsement.

National recognition and national commendation is deserved by railroad employees and employers for the example of peaceful mediation they gave the country when they got together and agreed upon the features of this legislation. That action provides an illuminating contrast with the methods of strike warfare we see on all sides today. The contrast should add laurels of respect and confidence for railroad labor and management.

One of the many things about this bill that pleases me a great deal is the action for correction of the disability feature. It covers a number of points. Here is one of them: Under the old law, employees who met the age requirements, who had necessary years of service, who were on the seniority rolls, but unable to report for active service by reason of disability, were excluded from the benefits of the law.

I understand it was not originally intended that way, but that is the way it worked out. When a man reaches the prescribed age, has the required service, and is still on the seniority roster, I do not think it is fair to exclude him on account of his disability. As a matter of fact, a disability under these conditions is all the more reason why he should receive these benefits. Now, in passing this bill we include those cases and extend a fair deal to hundreds of railroad men who were denied it under the old law.

For my part, the privilege of helping make this measure a law is the source of no small amount of satisfaction—the kind of satisfaction that comes from connection with service that is constructive and worth while. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that this bill is a good example of the splendid cooperation that can be reached by labor and management in all American industries, and I hope it will become a guidepost for labor and management in all industries of the United States. It is evident that the first rule of a happy productive life in the American economic structure is wholehearted cooperation of the various factors of production toward the end of common good.

One of the greatest privileges that has come to me as a member of this body and as a member of the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been to participate as an aid in this legislation which is the product of the great leadership of our colleague Mr. CROSSER. This bill is a splendid tribute to the thoughtful and considerate and careful analytical study that has made Mr. CROSSER an authority on the solution of the problems of the railroad industry. You and I know Mr. CROSSER to be fearless, firm, and forceful in the advocacy of his convictions, and this bill is born of the tireless energy which has been his in arriving at the proper conclusions as to the solution of these problems.

This bill becomes a constructive example for all future legislation of a similar character.

Step by step the investigations Mr. CROSSER has made have brought the truths upon which agreement could be reached. Differences of opinion that at the outset might have existed between labor and management have been reconciled upon the patriotic recognition of justice.

Always persevering, undaunted, tenacious, BOB CROSSER has labored toward the goal that is reached today. In this evidence of agreement between labor and management the railroad industry has given sight to the social blindness that has sometimes existed in our industrial and economic organization.

From the standpoint of the broad problem of industrial cooperation in all enterprises throughout the Nation, this bill is only a step toward victory in the solution of that problem, but it is a force which will be in the years to come continuously conquering the resisting powers. In bringing this legislation to this House today, BOB CROSSER has turned a searchlight on the darkness of confusion that exists in a part of industrial America and has demonstrated to the world that where reason sits at the conference table, patriotism will make sufficient sacrifice and concession to reach the goal of common good.

I feel a deep personal pride in being a participant in the production of this legislation, and the Seventy-fifth Congress will have reason to be lastingly proud of the contribution that we are here today making to the general welfare of this Nation.

Finally, further about the author of this bill, I only want to say that time will long remember though men may soon forget his great achievement in this today. And though the God-kept score of years does not reveal to us the memories that history will hold for this achievement, it still remains that the centuries will show that this great monumental work will live after him to the lasting benefit of mankind.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of suspending rules in order that we might pass the bill which has been reported by the Member from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

This bill is a move in the right direction. While by no means a perfect bill itself, it is designed to meet certain difficulties which have developed since the enactment of the act approved August 29, 1935.

The purpose of this measure is to make possible and permanent a retirement system for the employees of our railroad-transportation lines. It is in keeping with the philosophy of the present administration for it extends the frontiers of social progress and makes it possible for our veteran railroad workers to enjoy a fair measure of economic security in the closing years of their lives.

This bill is the third of its kind that has come before the House in the last several years. The first act was invalidated by the courts; the second has not run the entire gauntlet of our judicial system but it has been acted upon by our district courts; this, the third measure, we hope will meet all the objections raised against the two previous measures. We have every reason to believe that the issue will now be definitely settled with the passage of this measure and that the principle of retirement will be as permanent as the railroads themselves.

This measure contains the objectives of both of its predecessors. It protects the personnel of the Retirement Board and both the claimants and the annuitants recognized under the law of 1935 are given protection and consideration under the terms of this proposal. This bill adds rail-service associations to the list of employers and organizations, and their representatives, to those who are entitled to retirement. In some respects it broadens existing law, while in some of its provisions it is more restrictive. Taken all in all, it represents a fine accomplishment, a splendid achievement, a forward step along the road of social progress and economic security.

I desire to compliment the sponsor of the measure, the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague [Mr. CROSSER], who has sponsored numerous measures improving the conditions of our railroad workers. His service has been commendable.

Our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the President and his advisers, the representatives of the railroad organizations, and the representatives of the railroad management, are to be congratulated for the great part they all played in bringing before us this splendid legislation. The bill is the result of many happy and successful conferences. It is indicative of what can be done when there is real democracy in industry. It is an example which I trust will be emulated throughout the industrial life of our Nation, for it presents a real solution of our difficulties.

With democracy in government and in industry we will enjoy a greater measure of peace, both within and without the confines of our Republic.

The bill provides for the payment of annuities out of the Treasury of the United States to employees upon their retirement from the service of our railroad transportation lines on account of age, service, or disability.

Among the changes from existing law included in this proposal can be listed the following:

This measure extends the provisions of the existing law and includes in the category of employers, in addition to carriers and companies directly or indirectly controlled by them, groups which are not clearly or specifically included in the law of 1935. These groups include railroad associations, traffic associations, traffic bureaus, demurrage bureaus, weighing and inspection bureaus, collection agencies and other associations, bureaus, agencies, or organizations controlled and maintained wholly or principally by two or more employers as defined in the bill and engaged in the performance of services in connection with or incidental to railroad transportation, as well as railway labor organizations which are national in scope, organized in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, and their State and National legislative committees, general committees, insurance departments, local lodges, and divisions.

Another change from present law is that in the bill the language has been amended to include a company or companies owned or controlled in common by several companies.

Casual service and the casual operation of equipment or facilities is excluded by this bill.

Employees coming under the provisions of this bill are those in the service of persons defined as "employers", or in an employment relation to such employers, as well as officers or official representatives of employee organizations, other than labor organizations, included in the term "employer", in the service of such employer, and duly authorized and designated to represent employees, in accordance with the Railway Labor Act.

The term "employment relation" refers to those persons absent on account of sickness or disability. A slight change from existing law is made here in that only persons on furlough will be required to be "ready and willing" to return to service in order to be in an employment relation. Those on leave of absence or absent because of sickness or disability are to be considered, under this bill, to have an employment relation.

The following persons will be eligible for annuities under this bill:

First. Persons who are 65 years old or over.

Second. Persons who were 60 or over on August 29, 1935, with 30 years of service but with a reduction of one one-hundred-and-eightieth of the annuity for each month the person may be under age 65.

Third. Persons 60 years of age, totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire, irrespective of the number of years of service, but with a reduction of one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each month under age 65.

Fourth. Persons with 30 years of service who are totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire.

The above shows three differences from existing law: First, a disability annuity at the age of 60 is granted to persons having less than 30 years of service; second, the age is changed from 50 to 60 for retirement, with reduced annuity of those with 30 years of service; and third, in granting a disability annuity the requirement that a person be retired by the carrier on account of physical or mental disability is changed so as to require that he be totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire according to the decision of the Retirement Board and not of the carrier.

I trust the bill will pass without delay and that it will be improved as time and experience indicates the need for such changes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record in support of this legislation and pay a tribute to my colleague, ROBERT CROSSER. I think the House is cognizant of his work and his labor in behalf of the railroad men of the country. Living, as he has, under severe handicap of ill health, it is a tribute to him. In the full vigor of health it is easy for some of us to go forward, but I have watched my colleague, day in and day out, for months, for years, devoting every ounce of his strength trying to pass legislation of this kind. It is a tribute to him, it is a tribute to the great railroad brotherhoods to have him as their spokesman in this House of Representatives, it is a tribute to the great railroad industry to know that he plays the game on the level and plays fair with both sides.

This railroad retirement bill under consideration represents a substitute for the Retirement Act of 1935. It may be termed a compromise measure agreed upon by the representatives of the railroad brotherhoods and the railroad industry of the country.

In these days of industrial discord and bloody strikes the Nation may well look to a precedent established by these groups representing employer and employee of a great industry, demonstrating that it is possible to perfect a meeting of the minds and reach a common agreement satisfactory to both sides through the orderly process of mediation. Not only in the matter of perfecting this Railroad Retirement Act, but in matters of industrial disputes have the railroads and the great brotherhoods averted strikes and inconvenience to the traveling public and the shippers, but they have by their example given a fine demonstration of leadership in the field of organized labor.

With all respect to the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods who have worked untiringly for this and similar legislation, in my opinion there emerges one individual who has all the qualities of leadership so necessary today in this age of collective bargaining. I refer to George Harrison, president of the railroad clerks, whose trained mind and thorough knowledge of the problems that beset organized labor and whose fairness on every occasion has stamped him as a courageous leader with a splendid future before him.

Mr. Speaker, there are thousands and thousands of railroad employees who will rejoice in knowing this measure has passed the House of Representatives. No longer need they fear retirement or lay-offs at the age of 65 without security. It will give opportunity to many more for work in the railroad industry, and with the information before the House today that a tacit agreement has been made between both parties to this controversy that no attempt will be made to test the constitutionality of this act, bringing to the workers good cheer and the incentive to continue loyal in the service where many of them have spent the greater portion of their lives.

I am happy to have this privilege today to express my views on this legislation as a friend of labor for many years, and one who in the past was identified with organized labor in seeking to bring about a shorter working day and better working conditions for those who toil. The tremendous sentiment expressed in the House of Representatives in favor of this sort of legislation, the well-deserved compliments and tributes paid to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], is an indication that the rank and file of our citizenry are deeply in sympathy with the problem of old-age security, a living wage, and better working conditions for those who struggle in the field of industry, irrespective of its nature.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is to be only one other speech on the part of those having the bill in charge.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I was a Member of the House and voted for the first retirement bill. I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee that prepared the second retirement bill. I had much to do with its preparation and consideration before the committee, but the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is the father of all this class of legislation. Without him these bills may never have been considered. Too much credit cannot be given him. I have voted for each retirement bill that has passed this House. I expect to support this measure because I think it is the best of all of them, and because I believe that the bill is so drawn as to successfully withstand any attack on the ground of constitutionality. [Applause.]

The second retirement bill was drawn with two special and distinct parts or sections. One was the provision providing for the amount the railroads and the employees were to pay to be used as a fund out of which the pensions might be paid. The other provision was one that provided who was to be entitled to receive this pension and how much each man was to receive and how long the service must be, and so forth. The Supreme Court had found the first bill to be unconstitutional, and it looked as if the second would also be held to be unconstitutional. It was thought advisable to divide these bills and permit the bill providing the amount the railroads should pay and the amount the employees should pay and the manner of payment and all incidents thereto to be considered by the Ways and Means Committee, which of right should consider it. And it was also thought advisable that another bill should be introduced providing who should be entitled to draw this pension and how much each class should draw, and also to provide what age men should be required or be eligible to draw the pension. Also whether men who had been on furlough, and so forth, should be entitled to a pension. This bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That is the bill under consideration by us today. This bill should pass and it will pass today. The other bill has been reported out by the Ways and Means Committee and will, no doubt, come up in a day or two for consideration and will pass. These two bills will make the whole retirement plan complete. One bill is of no benefit without the other. The bill we will pass today is a bill that deals with a great many details. The bill that we will pass in a few days will be a financial bill, and while it is all important in that it supplies all of the money with which to operate both of the bills, it will not deal with so many details.

I am taking the liberty of making a rather extended explanation of the bill, and in doing so am quoting extensively from the report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill is divided into two parts. Part 1 amends the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935. Part 2 sets forth in detail the status of the Retirement Board and its rights and powers, and also the rights and powers of the claimants who have heretofore paid in certain payments, and so forth. Under the terms of the pending bill disabled persons who had lost their right to return to the service and were unable to qualify under the present law may qualify under the law that we are about to pass.

The bill includes as "employees" all who may be in the service of any person defined as an employer or who may be in the employment relation to any such person. The term "employee" also includes any officer or official representative of an organization of employees, other than a labor organization, included in the term "employer", as defined in section 1 (a), who shall have been in the service of such employer and who shall have been duly authorized and designated to represent employees, in accordance with the Railway Labor Act, as amended.

Under the pending bill only persons on furlough will be required to be "ready and willing" in order to be in "employment relation." Persons "on leave of absence or absent on account of sickness or disability", by the terms of the bill, will be considered to be in "employment relation", without regard to their ability to return to service when called.

Under the bill (sec. 2 (a)) the following persons, upon complying with the conditions hereafter stated will be eligible for annuities:

First. Persons 65 years of age or over.

Second. Persons who on the enactment date (Aug. 29, 1935) were 60 or more years of age, with 30 years of service, but with a reduction of one one-hundred-and-eightieth of the annuity for each month the person may be under age 65.

Third. Persons 60 years of age, who shall have been totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire, regardless of the number of years of service, but with a reduction of one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each month the person may be under age 65.

Fourth. Persons, regardless of age, who shall have had 30 years of service and who shall have been totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire.

The bill differs, therefore, from the existing law in three particulars:

First. It grants a disability annuity at age 60 to one with less that 30 years of service.

Second. It changes from 50 to 60, the age at which one with 30 years service may retire with a reduced annuity.

Third. With respect to a disability annuity, the requirement that a person be "retired by the carrier on account of physical or mental disability" is changed so as to require that he be "totally and permanently disabled for regular employment for hire" according to the decision of the Retirement Board and not of the carrier.

The existing law (sec. 215 (H) and sec. 217), requires a person, in order to be entitled to an annuity, to cease the service of a "carrier."

The bill (sec. 2) requires a person to cease rendering "compensated service to any person", whether or not an "employer" as defined in the act. In other words, he must cease to be employed for hire by any person and relinquish his right to return to carrier or other "employer" service or to the service of the person by whom he may have been employed when he shall have become eligible for his annuity. A person is not required by the bill to relinquish his right to engage in other employment—that is, in the employment of persons other than "employers" as defined in the act, or of other than the last person by whom he shall have been employed before receiving his annuity.

Neither the present act nor the bill makes retirement compulsory.

The present act (sec. 216) requires a person to retire at 65 or suffer a loss of one-fifteenth of his annuity for each year he may continue in service after that age unless he shall file with the Board a written agreement with the carrier each year for his continuance in service beyond age 65 but not beyond age 70. It further provides that regardless of any written agreement he shall suffer a reduction of one-fifteenth of his annuity for each year he continues after 70. The bill does not contain such provision but does provide that the service of a person 65 or more years of age may continue in service after July 1, 1937, shall not be considered in calculating his years of service (sec. 3 (b) (4)). It further provides that his compensation received after July 1, 1937, shall be disregarded in calculating his annuity if to include it would diminish his annuity.

The method of computing an annuity is the same in the bill as in the present act—that is, by multiplying the "years of service" by an amount equaling the total resulting from adding 2 percent of the first $50 of the average monthly compensation, 1½ percent of the next $100, and 1 percent of the next $150. For example, if a person's average monthly compensation should be $250, and his "years of service" 30, we should then add 2 percent of the first $50, or $1; 1½ percent of the next $100, or $1.50; and 1 percent of the next $100, or $1, and this would make a total of $3.50. If we then multiply this amount—$3.50—by 30, the result would be the amount of the annuity—that is, $105.

For service which may have been rendered after December 31, 1936, or what is called in the bill "subsequent service", the average monthly compensation shall be determined by taking the actual pay-roll average for such service rendered after December 31, 1936. For prior service—that is, for service rendered prior to January 1, 1937—the average monthly compensation shall be the average monthly compensation earned by the employee in calendar months in his years of service in the years 1924–31.

According to the terms of the pending bill, service which may have been rendered prior to January 1, 1937, will be included only in the cases of persons who may have been employees on the enactment date, August 29, 1935. It is not necessary under the pending bill that persons should have been actually engaged in compensated service on the enactment date. Prior service is allowed those on furlough or leave of absence or absent on account of sickness on such date, even though they may not have resumed compensated service since the enactment date. The bill includes in the years of service all service subsequent to December 31, 1936. If prior service should be included in order to make up the service period, the number of years so included is limited by the bill so as to prevent the total service period from exceeding 30 years.

The pending bill (sec. 3 (e)) makes the following provision:

Persons who may be employed when they shall have attained the age of 65 years and shall have completed 20 years' service shall be entitled to a minimum annuity of $40 per month: Provided, however, That if the monthly compensation on which his annuity may be based should be less than $50, the annuity shall be 80 percent of such monthly compensation, unless such 80 percent should be less than $20, in which case the annuity shall be either $20 or if such monthly compensation should be less than $20 then the annuity shall be equal to such monthly compensation. The bill also provides that the value of the annuity shall not be less than the value of the old-age benefit he would receive under title II of the Social Security Act if his service as an employee after December 31, 1936, were included in the term "employment" as defined in the Social Security Act.

The pending bill provides that upon the death of any employee at any time there shall be paid his widow, or, if there be no widow, to the person or persons designated by the employee, a sum equal to 4 percent of the total compensation, not exceeding $300 in any one month, paid to the employee on and after January 1, 1937, less any amount which may have been paid as an annuity to the employee or his spouse.

Persons on the carrier pension rolls who, on July 1, 1937, were eligible for annuities based in whole or in part on service rendered prior to January 1, 1937, shall from and after July 1, 1937, be paid an annuity under the Retirement Act and shall not be carried as pensioners transferred from the carrier pension rolls. In order, however, to avoid delay and confusion in qualifying such persons under the Retirement Act, provision is made to continue them as pensioners transferred from the carrier penson rolls until October 1, 1937, or to the date, prior to that time, on which they shall have qualified under the Retirement Act.

It is my confident hope that this bill will be found to be such a success as that in the future it will continue to meet the support of the men and of the railroad companies. This will be a great example of how successfully the employer and the employee can get along when they have an understanding and when each works for the benefit of the other. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this minute to say two things: First, I congratulate industry and labor on this happy conclusion of a long controversy. Second, I would be untrue to my feelings if, when a bill from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was being considered, I did not take the floor for a moment and reexpress my loyalty and my love for this great committee and its members. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay a tribute to a man who, in my opinion, is as good a man as there is in Congress or as has ever served in Congress, the man who has led this fight through all these years. I pay tribute to the fine statesman, the splendid gentleman from Ohio, ROBERT CROSSER. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad, as a member of the minority, to compliment the remarks that the majority leader has just made in reference to the service of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER.] I served with the gentleman for a good many years, and certainly nothing can be said that he does not fully deserve in the way of compliment for the work he has done in connection with this legislation.

It has been my privilege to be a member of the Ways and Means Committee during the time the companion bill to this measure has been under consideration. And now that the House is about to pass this bill recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I am glad to say that the Ways and Means Committee today unanimously voted the tax measure which is supposed to accompany the bill we now have before us.

I know of nothing that will redound more to the credit of both committees than the passage of these two bills, which benefit so many deserving men who have stood behind the railroads in this country for a long period of years. I therefore join with other Members of the House in congratulating the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for bringing this matter to a head.

Further, I think it is fair to say that the railroad interests, the employee interests, and the administration interests are united on this measure that we are about to pass. This was brought out in the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee this morning.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to join with the others in the hope that these two bills will soon become law. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, for the third time in 3 years, I have the privilege of presenting for the approval of the House, legislation providing for the retirement of railway workers on account of age. When, years ago I began the effort to have enacted a law providing a pension for aged railway workers there was enthusiasm in Congress for such a measure, though few were willing to believe that such a law could be passed in less than a decade.

In the year 1934, however, we succeeded in passing a measure providing substantially the benefits which are now provided by the bill before the House. That law was however declared unconstitutional by a 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court.

We then immediately started work for the passage of another measure in 1935, we were again successful in passing the present retirement law. I firmly believe that the 1935 law would have been upheld by the Supreme Court.

The desire was expressed, however, by railroad workers, railroad officials, and Government officials that the long conflict might be settled in a friendly way and an effort for such a settlement was begun early in January of this year.

A committee representing the Railway Labor Executives' Association worked with a committee representing the railroad officials, and by the exercise of great patience were remarkably successful in overcoming many of the antagonisms which had heretofore existed between them. These representatives then informed the Congress of the modification of their previous contentions.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have endeavored to report a bill which will remove, as completely as possible, the causes of dissatisfaction on the part of both railroad workers and railroad officials. We have tried to remove the grounds which caused antagonism to the previous railroad-retirement laws. We present for the approval of the House a measure which will assure railroad workers of comfort when the evening of life overtakes them. No longer need railroad men approach old age with the dread of poverty or in fear of want, but may continue through the closing years of life with the assurance that there will be no danger of starvation and that they will never be compelled to be in real want.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman will recall my interest in this bill, especially in one feature. Under the existing situation if a man retires at the age of 60 or 65, he would be prevented from engaging in any occupation. If he is a lawyer, he could not practice law, or he could not run a little gasoline station or engage in any other business.

Mr. CROSSER. I understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I understand this bill has corrected this feature?

Mr. CROSSER. The bill has corrected that in this way: It requires, as it always did require, a man, if he is in the railroad service, to quit his job. In other words, he may not receive a pension and at the same time continue at his work on the railroad. Or, if when he becomes eligible for a pension and should be working for someone else in another line of work, he must discontinue that work. But then he may go to work for whomever he pleases other than a railroad or for the particular employer last mentioned. I think that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. Speaker, I have probably had more to do with railroad-retirement legislation than any other Member of Congress. While I derive much satisfaction from the feeling that I have done something to assure railroad workers comfort and freedom from worry during the evening of life, yet my chief desire for them is to see such an adjustment to sound economic principles as will assure men equal rights and opportunity and which will make certain that they will receive as compensation the full value of their toil. Then men will be truly independent and will be free from worry. We must abolish unemployment, and by so doing we shall make it unnecessary for anyone to accept as compensation for his work anything less than what is fair and just. When unemployment no longer harasses men I can vision the time when harmony will prevail among the people and men will march arm in arm along the highway of life with songs of joy pealing from their hearts in the glorious cause of brotherhood. Then men will be freemen and the grandeur of creation will be manifest throughout the land.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman himself introduced all three of these bills?

Mr. CROSSER. That is so.

Mr. DOWELL. And he has followed them up until their final passage?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I may say to the gentleman that practically every Member of the House appreciates the good work he and the committee has done on this important legislation. The gentleman mentioned a while ago something about another similar retirement act having been declared unconstitutional. The gentleman and his committee, I assume, are now convinced that this bill is constitutional?

Mr. CROSSER. I think the retirement law of 1935 now on the statute books is constitutional. I do not wish to have any misunderstanding about that. The bill now pending before us is based upon the same principle as the act of 1935 but removes some of the grounds of controversy between the railroad companies and the men. It does not add anything to the constitutionality of the legislation. I think the legislation now on the statute books is constitutional. We have tried to be fair and to bring in legislation which will be supported by both the workers and the companies.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I know the marvelous work the gentleman has done for the railroad men throughout this country. I know he feels, just as other Members feel, that the railroad men of this country deserve a great deal of credit for carrying safely day after day the great number of human beings who travel on their trains. Their responsibility is heavy, and their record for safety and efficiency excels the performance of those in any other means of transportation. Almost unbelievable safety records have been made by our railroad men. In 1935 not a passenger was killed by collision or derailment; one passenger was killed as the result of the explosion of a heater, while 24 were killed while about to become passengers, in getting on or off of cars. For the year 1936 seven passengers were killed in train accidents and 10 died in getting on or off of trains. What a blessing it would be if our citizens, and particularly automobilists, had the same regard for their lives and the lives of others as do the railroad men.

Mr. CROSSER. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. Speaker, there is little more that I can say in the few moments remaining at my disposal on this subject.

The whole purpose of this legislation is to give practical expression to the great principle of human brotherhood—that is fundamental democracy.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. In view of the fact the gentleman is the outstanding authority on railroad-retirement legislation, I hope he will extend his remarks copiously in the RECORD so that we may look to his speech as being the authority on the facts and figures of this great legislation.

Mr. CROSSER. I shall endeavor to do so.

I am not under any misapprehension. I think this legislation will, of course, have to be amended in the future in the light of experience, as is the case with all legislation.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; briefly.

Mr. SHORT. I merely want to say as a friend of railroad men that I think that all the Members of the House feel deeply indebted to the gentleman from Ohio for his pertinacity and skill and for his untiring efforts and unfailing interest in behalf of this worthy cause.

Mr. CROSSER. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the gentleman if my interpretation is correct with respect to section 2, from line 17 down?

Mr. CROSSER. I cannot stop to answer long questions. I will answer the question in the RECORD, if the gentleman will put the question in the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I merely wanted to know if a man who had been employed 29 years and 4 months would enjoy the annuity?

Mr. CROSSER. It would require a long statement to answer that question, and I cannot take the time to do so now.

Mr. Speaker, to those who have been so complimentary and kind in their references to me, let me say, that if I have helped to make this world a better place in which to live, if I have done something to promote the cause of universal brotherhood, I am gratified, for I believe with Edwin Markham, who said:

> There is a destiny that makes us brothers,
> None goes his way alone;
> All that we send into the life of others,
> Comes back into our own.

I have tried and I hope I have succeeded in sending into the lives of others nothing that I would not welcome back into my own. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the suspension of the rules and the passage of the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CROSSER) there were—ayes 340, noes 0.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were yeas 363, nays 1, not voting 68, as follows:

[Roll No. 94]

YEAS—363

FEDERAL SURPLUS COMMODITIES CORPORATION

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (S. 2439) to extend the time for purchase and distribution of surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes and to continue the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think there was a misapprehension when the bill was objected to this morning. As I understand it, the gentlemen who objected are willing that the bill may be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out the provisions of clause (2) of section 32 of the act approved August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 774), as amended, the Secretary of Agriculture may transfer to the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, which Corporation is hereby continued, until June 30, 1939, as an agency of the United States under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, such funds, appropriated by said section 32, as may be necessary for the purpose of effectuating said clause (2) of section 32: Provided, That such transferred funds, together with other funds of the corporation, may be used for purchasing, exchanging, processing, distributing, disposing, transporting, storing, and handling of agricultural commodities and products thereof and inspection costs, commissions, and other incidental costs and expenses, without regard to the provisions of existing law governing the expenditure of public funds and for administrative expenses, including rent, printing and binding, and the employment of persons and means, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, such employment of persons to be in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to the employment of persons by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

In carrying out clause (2) of section 32, the funds appropriated by said section may be used for the purchase, without regard to the provisions of existing law governing the expenditure of public funds, of agricultural commodities and products thereof, and such commodities, as well as agricultural commodities and products thereof purchased under the preceding paragraph hereof, may be donated for relief purposes.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short report from the Department of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That there is hereby established the Civilian Conservation Corps, hereinafter called the corps, for the purpose of providing employment and training for citizenship for youthful citizens of the United States who are unemployed, and to a limited extent as hereinafter set out, for war veterans and Indians, through the performance of useful public work in connection with the conservation and development of the natural resources of the United States, its Territories and insular possessions.

"SEC. 2. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint a Director at a salary of $10,000 per annum. The Director shall have complete and final authority in the functioning of the corps, including the allotment of funds to cooperating Federal departments and agencies, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. In order to carry out the purpose of this act the Director is authorized to provide for the employment of the corps and its facilities on works of public interest or utility for the protection, restoration, regeneration, improvement, development, utilization, maintenance, or enjoyment of the natural resources of lands and waters, and the products thereof, including forests, fish, and wildlife on lands or interest in lands (including historical or archeological sites), belonging to, or under the jurisdiction or control of, the United States, its Territories and insular possessions, and the several States: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, authorize the Director to undertake projects on lands belonging to or under the jurisdiction or control of counties, and municipalities and on lands in private ownership, but only for the purpose of doing thereon such kinds of cooperative work as are or may be provided for by acts of Congress, including the prevention and control of forest fires, forest-tree pests and diseases, soil erosions, and floods: Provided further, That no projects shall be undertaken on lands or interests in lands other than those belonging to or under the jurisdiction or control of the United States unless adequate provisions are made by the cooperating agencies for the maintenance, operation, and utilizations of such projects after completion.

"SEC. 4. There are hereby transferred to the corps all enrolled personnel, records, papers, property, funds, and obligations of the Emergency Conservation Work established under the Act of March 31, 1933 (48 Stat. 22), as amended, and the corps shall take over the institution of the camp exchange heretofore established and maintained, under supervision of the War Department, in connection with and aiding in administration of Civilian Conservation Corps work camps conducted under the authority of said act as amended.

"SEC. 5. The Director and, under his supervision, the heads of other Federal departments or agencies cooperating in the work of the corps are authorized within the limit of the allotments of funds therefor to appoint such civilian personnel as may be deemed necessary for the efficient and economical discharge of the functions of the corps, in accordance with the civil-service laws and regulations made thereunder, and their compensation shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended: Provided, That the employment of employees of the Emergency Conservation Work and of the cooperating Federal agencies whose compensation is paid from Emergency Conservation Work funds, as of June 30, 1937, and for at least 2 months prior thereto, may be continued, and such employees who do not have a competitive classified civil-service status appropriate for the positions to be occupied shall be permitted to take an appropriate noncompetitive examination to be given by the Civil Service Commission within a period of 10 months and those employees who do not receive an eligible rating as a result of said examination shall be dropped from the rolls not later than June 30, 1938: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to Reserve officers on active duty with the corps, enrollees of the corps, or unskilled labor: Provided further, That notwithstanding any contrary provisions of this or any other act the employment of Indians shall be in accordance with section 12 of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984).

"SEC. 6. The President may order Reserve officers of the Army and officers of the Naval and Marine Reserves to active duty with the corps under the provisions of section 37a of the National Defense Act and the Act of February 28, 1925, respectively.

"SEC. 7. The Director is authorized to have enrolled not to exceed 300,000 men at any one time, of which not more than 30,000 may be war veterans: Provided, That in addition thereto camps or facilities may be established for not to exceed 10,000 additional Indian enrollees and 5,000 additional Territorial and insular-possession enrollees.

"SEC. 8. The enrollees in the corps (other than war veterans, enrollees in the Territories and insular possessions, Indians, not to exceed one mess steward, three cooks, and one leader per each company) shall be unmarried male citizens of the United States between the ages of 17 and 23 years, both inclusive, and shall at the time of enrollment be unemployed: Provided, That the Director may exclude from enrollment such classes of persons as he may consider detrimental to the well-being or welfare of the corps, except that no person shall be excluded on account of race, color, or creed: Provided further, That enrollments shall be for a period of not less than 6 months and reenrollments shall not exceed a total term of 2 years: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Director continuous service by the enrollee during his period of enrollment shall not be required in any case where the enrollee attends an educational institution of his choice during his leave of absence: Provided further, That the Director shall be authorized to issue certificates of proficiency and merit to enrollees under such rules and regulations as he may provide.

"SEC. 9. The compensation of enrollees shall be in accordance with schedules approved by the President, and enrollees shall be permitted, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Director, to make allotments of pay to dependents; to make deposits of pay in amounts specified by the Director with the Chief of Finance, War Department, to be repaid in case of an emergency or upon completion of or release from enrollment; and to receive the balance of their pay in cash monthly: Provided, That Indians may be excluded from these regulations: Provided further, That the pay of enrollees shall not exceed $30 per month, unless such enrollees are used as leaders or for special services for which an additional amount of pay is justified.

"SEC. 10. Enrollees shall be provided, in addition to the monthly rates of pay, with such quarters, subsistence, and clothing, or commutation in lieu thereof; medical attention; hospitalization; and transportation as the Director may deem necessary: Provided, That burial, embalming, and transportation expenses of deceased enrolled members of the Corps, regardless of the cause and place of death, shall be paid in accordance with regulations of the Employees' Compensation Commission applicable to employees injured in line of duty: Provided further, That the provisions of the act of February 15, 1934 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 76), relating to disability or death compensation and benefits, shall apply to the enrolled personnel of the Corps.

"SEC. 11. The Chief of Finance, War Department, is hereby designated, empowered, and directed, until otherwise ordered by the President, to act as the fiscal agent of the Director in carrying out the provisions of this act: Provided, That funds allocated to Government agencies for obligations under this act may be expended in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the usual work of such agency, except as otherwise stipulated in this act: Provided further, That in incurring expenditures the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), shall not apply to any purchase or service when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $300.

"SEC. 12. The President is hereby authorized to utilize the services and facilities of such departments or agencies of the Government as he may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 13. The Director and, under his supervision, the cooperating departments and agencies of the Federal Government are authorized to enter into such cooperative agreements with States and civil divisions as may be necessary for the purpose of utilizing the services and facilities thereof.

"SEC. 14. The Director may authorize the expenditure of such amounts as he may deem necessary for supplies, materials, and equipment for enrollees to be used in connection with their work, instruction, recreation, health, and welfare, and may also authorize expenditures for the transportation and subsistence of selected applicants for enrollment and of discharged enrollees while en route upon discharge to their homes.

"SEC. 15. That personal property as defined in the act of May 29, 1935 (49 Stat. 311), belonging to the corps and declared surplus by the Director, shall be disposed of by the Procurement Division, Treasury Department, in accordance with the provisions of said act: Provided, That unserviceable property in the custody of any department shall be disposed of under the regulations of that department.

"SEC. 16. The Director and, under his supervision, the heads of cooperating departments and agencies are authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay from the funds appropriated by Congress to carry out the provisions of this act any claim arising out of operations authorized by the act accruing after the effective date thereof on account of damage to or loss of property or on account of personal injury caused by the negligence of any enrollee or employee of the corps while acting within the scope of his employment: Provided, That the amount allowed on account of personal injury shall be limited to necessary medical and hospital expenses: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to any claim on account of personal injury for which a remedy is provided by section 10 of this act: Provided further, That no claim shall be considered hereunder which is in excess of $500, or which is not presented in writing within 1 year from the date of accrual thereof: Provided further, That acceptance by any claimant of the amount allowed on account of his claim shall be deemed to be in full settlement thereof and the action of the Director or of the head of a cooperating department or agency upon such claim so accepted by the claimant shall be conclusive.

"SEC. 17. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions and purposes of this act: Provided, That no part of any such appropriation shall be used in any way to pay any expense in connection with the conduct, operation, or management of any camp exchange, save and except such camp exchanges as are established and operated, in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Director, at such camps as may be designated by him, for real assistance and convenience to enrollees in supplying them and their supervising personnel on duty at any such camp with articles of ordinary use and consumption not furnished by the Government: Provided further, That the person in charge of any such camp exchange shall certify, monthly, that during the preceding calendar month such exchange was operated in compliance herewith.

"SEC. 18. This act, except as otherwise provided, shall take effect July 1, 1937."

Mr. RAMSPECK (interrupting the reading of the Senate amendment). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Senate amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the amendment read.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I think the chairman should explain the Senate amendment.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I shall explain the situation in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6551) to establish a Civilian Conservation Corps, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 6551) to establish a Civilian Conservation Corps, and for other purposes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the careful attention of the Members of the House while I offer an explanation which it is absolutely necessary for you to hear if you are to understand what we are trying to do here this afternoon. We have a most unusual parliamentary situation, and, unless you understand what we are trying to do, we are going to have a lot of trouble and confusion.

At the time the Civilian Conservation Corps bill was sent to conference, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] reserved the right to object and stated that "the important matter in this conference is the continuation of the Civilian Conservation Corps camps. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts should give the House to understand that he will bring this matter back to the House on the question of any permanent extension of the Civilian Conservation Corps." After some discussion of what action the House conferees would take in the conference, the gentleman from Massachusetts, the late Mr. Connery, stated:

I may say that we will not agree to anything upon which the House has passed by a vote until we ask for a further vote in the House.

To carry out Mr. Connery's promise, I am now bringing back to the House for a separate vote the various matters to which the statement relates. First, the matter of vocational education; second, the matter of applicability of the civil-service laws and regulations to the civilian personnel of the Corps; and third, the pay of enrollees who may be classified as leaders. Since the conferees do not propose a permanent Civilian Conservation Corps, but have informally agreed to recommend a 3-year extension for the 2-year extension in the House bill, I do not construe Mr. Connery's promise to apply to that provision and I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] will agree with me.

First, let me explain the parliamentary situation, briefly. After having reported a conference agreement to the House, Mr. Connery asked that the bill be recommitted to the conferees in order to give the House an opportunity to express its choice on the three matters. In pursuance of this desire, the conferees have reported a disagreement. I propose to offer a motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment. If that motion carries, which I trust it will, I then propose to offer three separate amendments to the Senate amendment which will substitute for the Senate provisions in controversy the House provisions. On each of these amendments a separate vote may be had if desired.

After the disposition of the three motions, I shall move to offer as a substitute for the entire Senate amendment a proposal which will contain, first, all the matters tentatively agreed on by the conferees, about which I am sure there is no substantial controversy; and, second, the matters which the House has just voted on in the previous separate three motions.

By following this procedure we shall be able to dispose of the noncontroversial matters, give the House the desired separate votes, and offer a proposition to the Senate which it can agree to or send to conference and which will set forth in definite fashion the position of the House.

I may say further that the reason for this complicated procedure is the fact that the Senate, in considering the House bill, struck out all after the enacting clause and substituted the Senate bill. It therefore became impossible for the conference, under the parliamentary situation, to carry out the promise which Mr. Connery made the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] when the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and sent to conference. This is the only parliamentary method by which we can carry out that promise, and I am sure the Members of the House, in view of what has happened since, will join with me in helping to keep a promise for a man who never broke one. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I may say to the gentleman that I think the committee of conference has done all it could in the matter. I had a short talk with our late colleague, Mr. Connery, a few days before he passed away, and he explained the matter to a certain extent, and his explanation was along the same line as that of the gentleman from Georgia. I think under the circumstances you have done all you could, and, while I would have preferred an extension of 2 years rather than 3 years, I think you have done your part, and I shall not raise any further objection. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I do not understand clearly the parliamentary situation. As I understand the gentleman's motion, it is to recede and concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; the motion now is simply to recede from our disagreement to the Senate amendment. If this motion is adopted, then I have some other motions which embody the position of the House on the question and upon which the House will have the opportunity of voting.

Mr. MAPES. I misunderstood the gentleman's motion.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the pending motion is adopted, then I shall offer a motion to put back in the bill the provisions of the House bill and we will then go to conference on that.

Mr. MAPES. After the House recedes, the gentleman then proposes to offer amendments to the Senate amendment?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS. Do I understand the gentleman proposes in these three motions to put the bill back in the shape it was in when it passed the House?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is absolutely correct with the exception of the difference between 3 years and 2 years.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the motions of the gentleman be debatable, as the gentleman understands it?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I shall have to ask the Chair that question.

The SPEAKER. If the question is submitted in the form of a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair may state that the motions will be debatable under the 1-hour rule.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that on page 1, line 3, of the Senate amendment, strike out "and training for citizenship" and insert ", as well as vocational training", and on page 1, line 9, before the period, insert ": Provided, That at least 10 hours each week may be devoted to general education and vocational education."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In listening to the second half of the amendment, as I understand it, it reads that at least 10 hours may be devoted each week to vocational training.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the gentleman mean that not more than 10 hours may be devoted to vocational training?

Mr. RAMSPECK. This is the language that was in the House bill, and what I am attempting to do is to give the House a chance to vote either up or down the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But let us say what we mean. We do not mean to say that at least a certain number of hours may be provided.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I understand the gentleman's point, but I am trying to stick to the agreement to bring this back to the House. Frankly, I like the language of the Senate bill on this particular matter better than I like the language of the House bill, but I am moving to put in the House provision to carry out the promise made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My only observation is that if the language now proposed ever reaches the statute books, it will not have any meaning.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. FULLER. If we adopt the gentleman's amendment, the gentleman still has the right on this particular language to change it in conference and bring it back to the House?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. Regarding the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] it seems to me, in view of the fact that these boys are expected after their terms of enlistment have expired to go out into the world and earn a livelihood, they ought to have at least 10 hours of training in vocational education as provided in the House bill. I think therefore the language in the House bill is preferable to the language in the Senate bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Which is not mandatory. It says at least 10 hours may be provided. If we want the 10 hours, we should say that not less than 10 hours shall be provided.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I listened as carefully as I could to the reading of the proviso and it occurred to me that it is not in the language of the House bill. Will the gentleman be good enough to repeat it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The language of the proviso is:

Provided, That at least 10 hours each week may be devoted to general education and vocational education.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. "Vocational education" is not the language originally used in the House bill. It was "vocational training." I have the bill before me.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If that is the case, then the language ought to be changed.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent to correct that language.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the last word in the amendment and change it from "education" to "training."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that on page 1, line 3, of the Senate amendment, strike out "and training for citizenship" and insert ", as well as vocational training"; and on page 1, line 9, before the period insert ": Provided, That at least 10 hours each week may be devoted to general education and vocational training."

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. DINGELL. As I understood the gentleman from Georgia has stated that he prefers personally the wording of the Senate.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. DINGELL. They both seek the same objective.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. DINGELL. Then, according to that, for the benefit of the membership of the House, am I correct in presuming that to attain the same objective and to be more certain it would be wiser on the part of the House to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It is a question of language, of course. I think the Senate language is broader, because it uses the words "training for citizenship", which includes everything.

Mr. DINGELL. I have a great deal of confidence in any advice the gentleman from Georgia gives to the House, and for that reason desire to follow him. I realize that he presents a problem here to carry out a certain agreement heretofore entered into, but that is merely the discharge of an obligation on the part of the gentleman from Georgia. I want to vote against the gentleman's motion if he thinks the Senate objects and the Senate wording is better.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Personally, I think the Senate language is preferable from a number of standpoints. However, I am not saying that to influence the vote of any Member. The Members can vote any way they please, but personally I like the Senate provision, because I think "training for citizenship" includes vocational training as well as every other kind of training that they might think would be worth while to make these boys better citizens.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. As I understand, you are not teaching "training for citizenship", which is very important under that section of the bill. You are adding to the training——

Mr. RAMSPECK. No, no. The gentleman is mistaken. We are moving to substitute "vocational training and general education" for the Senate language, which is "training for citizenship."

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will your language take care of those who want to train for citizenship, to make them better citizens?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think, under the language which I am moving to substitute, that they could teach anything except general education and vocational training.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Then you are practically repealing that training for citizenship that some men would like to get while in the camps?

Mr. RAMSPECK. We have taken out the Senate language. The gentleman knows the difference between the two provisions.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. But I think you are taking the heart out of the bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. We are trying to put back what was in the House bill.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Would the gentleman kindly report in full the Senate language, especially that portion of it, if it contains any reference, concerning the number of hours they shall teach? Does the Senate language have any provision with reference to the minimum or maximum number of hours?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Senate has no provision as to the number of hours. They struck out the House bill and substituted an entirely different bill. It contains this language:

That there is hereby established the Civilian Conservation Corps, hereinafter called the corps, for the purpose of providing employment and training for citizenship.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. Since the language in the Senate provision is so broad and general in nature, is there not danger of one camp having one idea about what citizenship is, and in following that idea teach some particular thing, while the man in charge of another camp would have an entirely different idea as to citizenship, and he would teach another thing, and would that not encourage lack of uniformity of training among these boys?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course the gentleman is as well able to judge that as I am, but I do not think so, for this reason: The educational program is directed from the Washington office of the corps. They have educational advisers in each camp, and I presume they are told what to teach.

Mr. NICHOLS. At least, if we did adopt the Senate provision, it is possible that any person in charge of instruction in any particular camp or section might teach anything so long as he was able to interpret it as being a course in good citizenship. That is right, is it not?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I presume so, subject, of course, to the direction of the chief officer in Washington.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Regardless of what the House does in connection with the matter of vocational education or general education program, personally I believe the Senate language is preferable, because, as the gentleman says, the direction of the educational program is from Washington, and the camp educational directors of course follow their own initiative, and we will provide for it in whichever way we adopt this amendment; but regardless of that fact, we must not overlook that whereas it is important to bring out the educational program for these boys, we must not fail to take into consideration the splendid accomplishments of the work program of the C. C. C.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I call the gentleman's attention to some statements made in the hearings with relation to this very matter, and if I am wrong I want my colleague to correct me. The basis of Mr. Fechner's testimony on this training was that we were now training them for citizenship, and he did not think the camps could train them vocationally because they were not so equipped, but that they were training them for citizenship. Is not that the basis of his testimony?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think so, in substance. However, he did say that they were receiving vocational training in connection with the work to a certain extent.

Mr. GRISWOLD. That is, on the job. They obtained that as a part of the work they were doing, but he claimed that the whole system of the camp was an education for citizenship.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. GRISWOLD. And also the director of education, or whatever his title is, who appeared before the committee along with Mr. Fechner, testified to practically the same thing, I believe.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Is it not true, then, that on the basis of that testimony of the present administration, both on the educational system and the camps in general, the Senate language would leave us in the position of having the same educational facilities and the same educational program that we have now, with practically no change?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think the gentleman's assumption is correct.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. The phrase in the Senate amendment "training for citizenship" has a very restricted meaning in a great many of the schools and colleges of the country, their contention being that it relates particularly to the question of government. As I understand it, the gentleman does not want to exclude vocational training. I am wondering whether that language is definite enough to cover the purposes of the C. C. C. camps.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think it is, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I presume that the conferees had some discussion as to the meaning of the term in the Senate amendment "training for citizenship." For the sake of the RECORD, will the gentleman inform us as to whether there was any discussion among the conferees, or any suggestion in the minds of the members of the House Committee on Labor that training for citizenship should include military training?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It was never in the minds of the conferees that it should include military training.

Mr. BOILEAU. Then it is the gentleman's idea that the expression "training for citizenship" does not include military training?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct; I have no such idea.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Regarding this inquiry in respect of military training, may I say that Dr. Fechner appeared before the Appropriations Subcommittee on the War Department and at that time stated very emphatically that he did not want to have military training go any further than it does now in the camps.

I rose, Mr. Speaker, primarily to ask the gentleman if there was any objection to substituting the word "shall" for the word "may" in the amendment, making it read "that not less than 10 hours shall be devoted to educational training"?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there is a good deal of objection to that. In the first place, if it is made mandatory it would take many millions of dollars to carry it out, for it would involve the building of many buildings and the acquisition of much equipment and facilities that the Administration at present lacks for such a mandatory program.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not want to torture this subject, but I do want this sentence to mean something. As it is presently written it does not mean anything. It reads that "at least 10 hours each week may be devoted." That is meaningless. The gentleman from Georgia has raised the objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that changing the word "may" to "shall" would be too expensive. Would the gentleman from Georgia favor changing the language to read "not more than 10 hours may be devoted"? This will mean something.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I personally would not have any objection to that; but I do not think we want to start amending these motions.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. As I understand the gentleman's motion, it is to eliminate vocational training. Am I right?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Oh, no; my motion is to restore the language that was in the bill as it passed the House. The gentleman is familiar with that, I am sure. It calls for "vocational training and general education."

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. In other words, it will be as the House passed the bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Exactly.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has already been ordered, the Chair will state to the gentleman. It is too late to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that on page 3, lines 15 to 25, and page 4, lines 1 to 11, of the Senate amendment, strike out "in accordance with the civil-service laws and regulations made thereunder, and their compensation shall be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended: Provided, That the employment of employees of the emergency conservation work and of the cooperating Federal agencies whose compensation is paid from emergency conservation work funds, as of June 30, 1937, and for at least 2 months prior thereto, may be continued, and such employees who do not have a competitive classified civil-service status appropriate for the positions to be occupied shall be permitted to take an appropriate noncompetitive examination to be given by the Civil Service Commission within a period of 10 months and those employees who do not receive an eligible rating as a result of said examination shall be dropped from the rolls not later than June 30, 1938: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to Reserve officers on active duty with the corps, enrollees of the corps, or unskilled labor: Provided further, That notwithstanding any contrary provisions of this or any other act the employment of Indians shall be in accordance with section 12 of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984)" and insert "without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, in the nearly 8 years I have been a Member of Congress, this is the first time I have ever made a motion to take civil service out of a bill. I am doing it now in order to carry out the promise of my beloved colleague who has passed away.

If the House adopts this motion as I have made it, it will take out the civil-service provision inserted by the Senate and restore the language of the House bill which provides for appointments in the Civilian Conservation Corps without regard to the civil service. Personally, of course, I shall vote against my own motion, but this gives the House a chance to reassert its position.

I think there is probably no necessity for further discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSPECK) there were—ayes 143, noes 77.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present, and I object to the vote on that ground.

The SPEAKER. The Chair just announced a vote totaling 220 Members.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer another motion, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that, on page 6, lines 3 to 6, of the Senate amendment, strike out "That the pay of enrollees shall not exceed $30 per month unless such enrollees are used as leaders or for special services for which an additional amount of pay is justified" and insert "That the pay of enrollees shall not exceed $30 per month, except for not more than 10 percent who may be designated as leaders and who shall receive not more than $36 a month: Provided further, That not to exceed 6 percent shall receive $45 as leader."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, this substitutes the language of the House bill in the Senate bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is the present pay schedule, is it not?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I understand so.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. Does the gentleman know that 10 percent of the present enrollees are now used as assistant leaders and 6 percent are used as leaders? I am frank to say I do not know.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not know about the percentage. I know some of them are.

Mr. NICHOLS. As a matter of fact I am heartily in sympathy with this amendment and supported it; however, there is not a great deal of disagreement between the Senate proposal and the House proposal, is there?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The Senate proposal is similar to what we have always had in the law; that is, $30 a month.

Mr. NICHOLS. But it does make an exception?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It makes an exception of the leaders.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is that because of existing law?

Mr. RAMSPECK. In the existing law there is no limit on the pay, as I understand it. That is fixed by the President.

Mr. NICHOLS. Did not the hearings before the gentleman's committee indicate that the percentage of 10 percent and 6 percent were about right as it was being worked now?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wonder if any member of the committee is able to answer that question?

Mr. RANDOLPH. In connection with the percentages which have been discussed by the gentleman from Oklahoma, and in answer to his question, may I say it has been brought out that the 10 percent and the 6 percent are in excess of those who are now what we call leaders in the camps. In relation to the other question that has been raised of the pay schedule, although it is not in existing law, they are operating upon the plan which is offered in the amendment, paying up to $45 a month for a certain number of leaders. That is by virtue of the director of the Emergency Conservation work himself.

Mr. NICHOLS. Then the real purpose of the House provision is to provide a uniform percentage throughout the United States which will apply to all camps alike? That is, so as not to exceed 10 or not more than 10 percent. This fixes the top, but fixes it so that it will be uniform throughout all of the camps in the United States?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman is absolutely correct in his interpretation, as I understand it.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman tell us which of these provisions in regard to the pay schedule, the Senate or the House provision, is the most economical?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman very frankly I do not think anybody could answer that question. It depends on the administration. I do not think they would ever have more than the percentages set out here because where there has been no regulation I do not think they would exceed that; although, of course, under the language of the Senate amendment they could exceed that. The House provision is a limitation which the Senate provision does not provide.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that, on page 5, line 10, of the Senate amendment, after "reenrollment", insert "(except in the case of one mess steward, three cooks, and one leader, in each company, and war veterans)."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for this motion arises from the fact that the language in the bill as adopted by the Senate is considered by the Director and those in charge as a limitation on the time the enrollees could stay in the camps. The Director and those who are responsible for administering this legislation feel that the language would also limit the time war veterans could stay in the camps, and also it would limit the time that the mess steward, the three cooks, and the leader might stay in the camp. Therefore, I have offered this motion amending the Senate bill so as to take those classes out of the limitation.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. Do the provisions of the Senate bill limit the time that enrollees may stay in the camps?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The junior enrollees cannot stay for over 2 years, under the language of the Senate bill. There are war veterans who have already been in camp 2 years who would have to be dismissed without this amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. In the bill as it passed the House there was no limitation on enrollees?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I cannot answer the gentleman's question. I do not have the bill before me. I do not remember the language. However, this matter was called to my attention by the Acting Director himself, and we are trying to straighten it out here.

Mr. NICHOLS. I can see how the gentleman's amendment is necessary in order to have some nucleus of permanent organization in the camp, but I am wondering if it is wise to go as far as to limit enrollees, when that is an administrative matter which should be handled by those in charge of enrollees, and so forth. If it is left open, they can by administrative order govern the time for enrollees and the number of enrollees as they have done in the past. Of course, the gentleman's amendment will go back to conference, and even if the question is not voted on at this time, I would suggest that the conferees discuss rather thoroughly and consider rather thoroughly the advisability of limiting the time enrollees may stay in the camp, and report back to the House. Of course, I shall support the gentleman's pending amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. As the gentleman from Oklahoma has stated, I think that if we pass this amendment it will be in order for the conferees to discuss the matter of the time of enrollees. As the bill passed the House, there was no time limit set upon the enrollee himself, but we realize that today there are about 25,000 war veterans in the C. C. C. program. The language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia certainly would take care of that group and protect it. It will also be helpful as the conferees discuss the further subjects of enrollment and of the enrollees themselves. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further motion.

The Clerk read the motion, as follows:

Mr. RAMSPECK moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"That there is hereby established the Civilian Conservation Corps, hereinafter called the corps, for the purpose of providing employment, as well as vocational training, for youthful citizens of the United States who are unemployed and in need of employment, and to a limited extent as hereinafter set out, for war veterans and Indians, through the performance of useful public work in connection with the conservation and development of the natural resources of the United States, its Territories, and insular possessions: Provided, That at least 10 hours each week may be devoted to general educational and vocational training: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall continue for the period of 3 years after July 1, 1937, and no longer.

"SEC. 2. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint a Director at a salary of $10,000 per annum. The Director shall have complete and final authority in the functioning of the corps, including the allotment of funds to cooperating Federal departments and agencies, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. In order to carry out the purposes of this act, the Director is authorized to provide for the employment of the corps and its facilities, on works of public interest or utility for the protection, restoration, regeneration, improvement, development, utilization, maintenance, or enjoyment of the natural resources of lands and waters, and the products thereof, including forests, fish, and wildlife on lands or interest in lands (including historical or acheological sites), belonging to, or under the jurisdiction or control of the United States, its Territories and insular possessions, and the several States: Provided, That the President may, in his discretion, authorize the Director to undertake projects on lands belonging to or under the jurisdiction or control of counties and municipalities and on lands in private ownership, but only for the purpose of doing thereon such kinds of cooperative work as are or may be provided for by acts of Congress, including the prevention and control of forest fires, forest-tree pests and diseases, soil erosion, and floods: Provided further, That no projects shall be undertaken on lands or interests in lands other than those belonging to or under the jurisdiction or control of the United States, unless adequate provisions are made by the cooperating agencies for the maintenance, operation, and utilization of such projects after completion.

"SEC. 4. There are hereby transferred to the corps all enrolled personnel, records, papers, property, funds, and obligations of the Emergency Conservation Work established under the act of March 31, 1933 (48 Stat. 22), as amended; and the Corps shall take over the institution of the camp exchange heretofore established and maintained, under supervision of the War Department, in connection with and aiding in administration of Civilian Conservation Corps work camps conducted under the authority of said act as amended: Provided, That such camp exchange shall not sell to persons not connected with the operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

"SEC. 5. The Director and, under his supervision, the heads of other Federal departments or agencies cooperating in the work of the corps, are authorized within the limit of the allotments of funds therefor to appoint such civilian personnel as may be deemed necessary for the efficient and economical discharge of the functions of the corps, without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations.

"SEC. 6. The President may order Reserve officers of the Army and officers of the Naval and Marine Reserves and warrant officers of the Coast Guard to active duty with the corps under the provisions of section 37a of the National Defense Act and the act of February 28, 1925, respectively.

"SEC. 7. The Director is authorized to have enrolled not to exceed 300,000 men at any one time, of which not more than 30,000 may be war veterans: Provided, That in addition thereto camps or facilities may be established for not to exceed 10,000 additional Indian enrollees and 5,000 additional Territorial and insular possession enrollees.

"SEC. 8. The enrollees in the corps (other than war veterans, enrollees in the Territories and insular possessions, Indians, not to exceed one mess steward, three cooks, and one leader per each company) shall be unmarried male citizens of the United States between the ages of 17 and 23 years, both inclusive, and shall at the time of enrollment be unemployed and in need of employment: Provided, That the Director may exclude from enrollment such classes of persons as he may consider detrimental to the well-being or welfare of the corps, except that no person shall be excluded on account of race, color, or creed: Provided further, That enrollments shall be for a period of not less than 6 months and reenrollments (except in the case of one mess steward, three cooks, and one leader in each company, and war veterans) shall not exceed a total term of 2 years: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Director continuous service by the enrollee during his period of enrollment shall not be required in any case where the enrollee attends an educational institution of his choice during his leave of absence: Provided further, That the Director shall be authorized to issue certificates of proficiency and merit to enrollees under such rules and regulations as he may provide.

"SEC. 9. The compensation of enrollees shall be in accordance with schedules approved by the President, and enrollees with dependent member or members of their families shall be required, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Director, to make allotments of pay to such dependents. Other enrollees may make deposits of pay in amounts specified by the Director with the Chief of Finance, War Department, to be repaid in case of an emergency or upon completion of or release from enrollment and to receive the balance of their pay in cash monthly: Provided, That Indians may be excluded from these regulations: Provided further, That the pay of enrollees shall not exceed $30 per month, except for not more than 10 percent who may be designated as leaders and who shall receive not more than $36 a month: Provided further, That not to exceed 6 percent shall raceive $45 as leader.

"SEC. 10. Enrollees shall be provided, in addition to the monthly rates of pay, with such quarters, subsistence, and clothing, or commutation in lieu thereof, medical attention, hospitalization, and transportation as the Director may deem necessary: Provided, That burial, embalming, and transportation expenses of deceased enrolled members of the corps, regardless of the cause and place of death, shall be paid in accordance with regulations of the Employees' Compensation Commission: Provided further, That the provisions of the act of February 15, 1934 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 5, sec. 796), relating to disability or death compensation and benefits shall apply to the enrolled personnel of the corps.

"SEC. 11. The Chief of Finance, War Department, is hereby designated, empowered, and directed, until otherwise ordered by the President, to act as the fiscal agent of the Director in carrying out the provisions of this act: Provided, That funds allocated to Government agencies for obligation under this act may be expended in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the usual work of such agency, except as otherwise stipulated in this act: Provided further, That in incurring expenditures, the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 41, sec. 5), shall not apply to any purchase or service when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $300.

"SEC. 12. The President is hereby authorized to utilize the services and facilities of such departments or agencies of the Government as he may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

"SEC. 13. The Director and, under his supervision, the cooperating departments and agencies of the Federal Government are authorized to enter into such cooperative agreements with States and civil divisions as may be necessary for the purpose of utilizing the services and facilities thereof.

"SEC. 14. The Director may authorize the expenditure of such amounts as he may deem necessary for supplies, materials, and equipment for enrollees to be used in connection with their work, instruction, recreation, health, and welfare, and may also authorize expenditures for the transportation and subsistence of selected applicants for enrollment and of discharged enrollees while en route upon discharge to their homes.

"SEC. 15. That personal property as defined in the act of May 29, 1935 (49 Stat. 311), belonging to the corps and declared surplus by the Director, shall be disposed of by the Procurement Division, Treasury Department, in accordance with the provisions of said act: Provided, That unserviceable property in the custody of any department shall be disposed of under the regulations of that department.

"SEC. 16. The Director and, under his supervision, the heads of cooperating departments and agencies are authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay from the funds appropriated by Congress to carry out the provisions of this act any claim arising out of operations authorized by the act accruing after the effective date thereof on account of damage to or loss of property or on account of personal injury to persons not provided for by section 10 of this act, caused by the negligence of any enrollee or employee of the corps while acting within the scope of his employment: Provided, That the amount allowed on account of personal injury shall be limited to necessary medical and hospital expenses: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to any claim on account of personal injury for which a remedy is provided by section 10 of this act: Provided further, That no claim shall be considered hereunder which is in excess of $500, or which is not presented in writing within 1 year from the date of accrual thereof: Provided further, That acceptance by any claimant of the amount allowed on account of his claim shall be deemed to be in full settlement thereof, and the action of the Director or of the head of a cooperating department or agency upon such claim so accepted by the claimant shall be conclusive.

"SEC. 17. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of this act: Provided, That no part of any such appropriation shall be used in any way to pay any expense in connection with the conduct, operation, or management of any camp exchange, save and except such camp exchanges as are established and operated, in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Director, at such camps as may be designated by him, for real assistance and convenience to enrollees in supplying them and their supervising personnel on duty at any such camp with articles of ordinary use and consumption not furnished by the Government: Provided further, That the person in charge of any such camp exchange shall certify, monthly, that during the preceding calendar month such exchange was operated in compliance herewith.

"SEC. 18. This act, except as otherwise provided, shall take effect July 1, 1937."

Mr. RAMSPECK (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the amendment and that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I may state to the House in explanation of the amendment that it contains the amendments which the House has just adopted, together with the other language necessary to carry out the parliamentary procedure. The amendment also contains the noncontroversial matters informally agreed to by the conferees and the substance of House Concurrent Resolution 15. This resolution provides that in the enrollment of the bill there shall be stricken out language which does not permit the payment of cost of shipment home of bodies of deceased enrollees. The resolution was to correct this mistake, and it has been deemed advisable to include its provisions in the present amendment. The conferees and the administration are in agreement that this correction should be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the amendment to the Senate amendment, and that it be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Georgia if after the conferees have again met on this matter, if there is disagreement regarding the position expressed by the House today the bill will be brought back to the House in such shape the House can again express itself separately on the amendments offered by the conferees?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman I do not think that is possible under the parliamentary procedure, because we are dealing with a Senate amendment, which is language inserted after striking out all after the enacting clause of the House bill. The very reason we have gone through this complicated procedure today is simply to carry out a promise similar to the one the gentleman is now asking me to make, which I would have no authority to make, anyway, because I am not in charge of the proposed legislation. I do not think it will be possible, but I certainly would not agree that we should go through this procedure again, because if we did, we would never get through with it, and this law must be enacted by the 30th of June.

Mr. NICHOLS. Of course, it could be done by doing the same thing we have done today.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; by having a complete disagreement and coming back and following this procedure again. I may say to the gentleman I think I know what he has in his mind, and, so far as I am concerned, although I personally do not agree with the action of the House, if I am appointed a conferee again, I expect individually to uphold the position of the House on the civil-service provision, as far as possible.

Mr. NICHOLS. And on the other amendment, too, I presume?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Oh, yes.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman explain briefly just what this amendment is which he proposes, so the House will understand?

Mr. RAMSPECK. This amendment includes the amendments which we have adopted and certain other minor changes in the bill which were not in controversy and were not the subject of debate, motions, and votes in the House. This simply puts the bill back in parliamentary shape to go back to the Senate, so they can either accept it or send it to conference again.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. Not being familiar with the conference report, may I ask the gentleman if the salary of the Director is an item in controversy?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The salary of the Director is not in controversy, and remains as fixed by the House, the Senate having adopted the same amount.

Mr. MEAD. That is too bad.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is my understanding the action today by the House will bring about this situation. The Senate could agree to what we have done, and then it would not go to conference and we would not have to take it up again on this floor. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. They could accept the situation and the bill would go into effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia to dispense with the further reading of the amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXCISE TAX UPON CARRIERS AND CERTAIN OTHER EMPLOYERS AND INCOME TAX UPON CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. DOUGHTON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted a report on the bill (H. R. 7589, Rept. No. 1071) to levy an excise tax upon carriers and certain other employers, and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], on Monday next, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and the legislative program for that day, may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COCHRAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks.

STAMP PROVISIONS OF THE BOTTLING IN BOND ACT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6737) to amend the stamp provisions of the Bottling in Bond Act.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I think the matter is of sufficient administrative importance for the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee or some member of the majority to explain the measure to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none and the gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] reserved the right to object, and the gentleman from North Carolina was going to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to state that he would not object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I stated that I reserved the right to object, but would not object.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to reserve the right to object simply to get an explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized to explain the bill, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] reserves the right to object.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill has a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means. The measure was considered very carefully and is one introduced at the instance of the Treasury Department.

The purpose of H. R. 6737 is to amend the stamp provisions of the Bottling in Bond Act of 1897 so as to permit the stamping of bottled in bond spirits under precisely the same conditions as those which under the provisions of the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934 now attend the stamping of other spirits.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue is now required under the provisions of present statutes to follow two entirely different systems in regulating the distribution and application of strip stamps to be affixed to bottled spirits. One applies to spirits not bottled in bond and the other to spirits bottled in bond.

The system applicable to spirits not bottled in bond is provided pursuant to the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934. The now familiar red strip stamps are supplied under the provisions of this act. Such stamps are manufactured in sheets by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, serially numbered, and supplied in quantity to all collectors of internal revenue, who keep them in stock awaiting orders from the distillers, rectifiers, and other bottlers. Upon the receipt of any such order, the stamps are registered by the collector in the name of the purchasing bottler and sent by registered mail to the Government officer in charge of the bottling plant. This officer keeps them in his official safe and issues them to the bottler to meet his daily requirements. This system is simple and inexpensive to the Government and convenient for the bottler, and it provides every necessary safeguard against the fraudulent use of the stamps.

In contrast with this simple system, the system applicable to spirits bottled in bond is extremely cumbersome and imposes a heavy burden upon the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. A separate manufacturing job is necessary to produce the stamps required for each separate lot of spirits which any distiller may propose to bottle in bond. This is necessitated by the provisions of the Bottling in Bond Act, which require that the green stamps to be affixed to the immediate containers of distilled spirits bottled in bond state the proof of the spirits, the registered distiller's number, the State and collection district in which the distillery is located, the distiller's name, the year and distilling season, such as spring or fall, and the year and season of bottling. In view of these complicated requirements, it is not practicable to place sheets of bottled-in-bond stamps in the hands of the various collectors of internal revenue as is done in the case of red-strip stamps. These sheets of bottled-in-bond stamps are first printed in blank by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and upon the receipt of an order for a stated quantity of particular stamps, it overprints them with the required information. The simplification of the bottled-in-bond stamps, as contemplated under this bill, would in no way alter the requirement that spirits bottled in bond must be of domestic production, straight; that is to say, unmixed or unblended, of precisely 100° proof and at least 4 years old.

Distilleries have been accumulating stocks of liquor since the beginning or resumption of their operations at the time of repeal, and the time will soon come when a very large quantity of distilled spirits will be bottled in bond. When this time arrives, it will become a matter of extreme difficulty to supply the stamps which will be required, if the present law is not changed so as to permit a simplification of the method of manufacture and distribution. The system which has been followed for more than 3 years in the issuance and use of red-strip stamps for distilled spirits not bottled in bond has proved satisfactory in every respect. These stamps are issued under regulations and safeguards which are calculated to insure that they will not fall into unauthorized hands, and that when applied to bottled spirits they may be relied upon both by the public and by officers of internal revenue as positive evidence that the Federal revenue laws have been fully complied with by the bottler. They are proof against counterfeiting.

Moreover, the change contemplated by the bill in the present method of stamping bottled-in-bond spirits will not only not be a source of expense to the Government, but will actually furnish an accretion to the annual revenue of the United States. The application of the unbonded liquor strip-stamp system to bonded liquor will mean an additional cost of at least 2 cents a case for the bottled-in-bond stamps. The distilled-spirits industry, however, will be amply compensated for the increased cost by the convenience of the new spstem. Representatives of the Treasury Department who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means stated that the present bill has the approval of the distillers.

Thus, both from the standpoint of convenience to the distillers and bottlers and increased revenue to the Government, the passage of H. R. 6737 is desirable so that bottled-in-bond spirits may be stamped under the same conditions as now attend the stamping of other spirits. This bill is strongly recommended by the Treasury Department and is in accord with the program of the President.

The measure has been agreed upon by the distiller, the bottler, and the Government, and I hope the explanation of the bill is satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first and fourth paragraphs of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond", approved March 3, 1897, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 26, sec. 1276), are designated "(1)" and "(6)", respectively, and the second and third paragraphs of said section are amended to read as follows:

"(2) Every bottle when filled shall have affixed thereto and passing over the mouth of the same a stamp denoting the quantity of distilled spirits contained therein and evidencing the bottling in bond of such spirits under the provisions of this act, and of regulations prescribed hereunder.

"(3) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe (a) regulations with respect to the time and manner of applying for, issuing, affixing, and destroying stamps required by this section, the form and denominations of such stamps, applications for purchase of the stamps, proof that applicants are entitled to such stamps, and the method of accounting for receipts from the sale of such stamps, and (b) such other regulations as the Commissioner shall deem necessary for the enforcement of this act.

"(4) Such stamps shall be issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to each collector of internal revenue, upon his requisition in such numbers as may be necessary in his district, and, upon compliance with the provisions of this act and regulations issued hereunder, shall be sold by collectors to persons entitled thereto, at a price of 1 cent for each stamp, except that in the case of stamps for containers of less than one-half pint, the price shall be one-quarter of 1 cent for each stamp.

"(5) And there shall be plainly burned, embossed, or printed on the side of each case, to be known as the Government side, such marks, brands, and stamps to denote the bottling in bond of the whisky packed therein as the Commissioner may by regulations prescribe."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FARLEY, for 7 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FERNANDEZ, for 10 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. JACOBSEN, for 5 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KLEBERG, for today, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. BEVERLY M. VINCENT, for 3 days, on account of important official business.

GOVERNMENT RUM

The SPEAKER. Under special order heretofore made, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have here a quart of Government rum presented to me by Secretary Harold Ickes, and I suggest the Sergeant at Arms protect it until I need it during the course of my remarks.

For 3 weeks or more I have been trying to get a few moments' time to speak to the House of Representatives. When the minority Members of the House of Representatives do not have a right to talk to the House, then their power is practically gone, because, with a majority in the House such as we have here of the New Deal party, it is very difficult, it is impossible, for a minority member to have any legislation brought to the floor of the House and enacted into law. His principal power is constructive criticism.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man at the present time. When the minority loses that right, then practically they lose all of the power they have. Ever since I have been trying to get this time, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] has asked me what I intended to talk about. I told him Jim Farley, and the fact that the Guffey-Earle-Lawrence political machine of Pennsylvania has taken all of the postmasters out of civil service and are putting politics into effect in Pennsylvania, in the Post Office Department, worse than ever the Vare or the Penrose machine could think of. Gentlemen, I have noticed that Mr. MCCORMACK always asked for time after I asked for time. He wanted to follow me. Mr. MCCORMACK has been sent to Massachusetts the past week on a sad mission, the death of our colleague, Mr. Connery. I would not betray that gentleman in his effort to uphold anything that Mr. Farley might do. I know that he is not here today, and for that reason I am not going to use the subject I had intended to use because I do not want to trouble the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], a good friend of mine, to get up here and try his best to take up the time alloted to Mr. MCCORMACK in saying something about the party machine, and I shall protect my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] this afternoon to that extent. I could talk about the New Deal legislation, and I could criticize many things that have transpired in the last 3 or 4 years. You gentlemen know that you have passed legislation and that you have found out afterward that it is faulty, and have repeatedly come back to the House of Representatives to have recent laws repealed. You know now that many of the New Deal laws you have still on the statute books should be eliminated or repealed for the country's good. You gentlemen on this side of the House are responsible for the conduct and the running of this Government, but when you pass such legislation as that which you passed several years ago, for the killing of pigs and the plowing under of cotton, for the burning of wheat, and the stamping of potatoes, for the confiscating of gold and taking it down to Kentucky and burying it, for better-housing administration, which you will find is going to be one of the biggest millstones around the neck of the country that was ever placed there, and when you find out what the National Emergency Council is doing, spending $100,000 a month and setting up in 48 States 48 political machines, you will want to consider trying to do away with a little of that legislation, because it will kill you if you do not. Since Frank C. Walker resigned 18 months ago it has been a real farce, a travesty to the taxpayers.

Another thing, you have been talking about these 5-to-4 decisions of the Supreme Court. I wonder what you fellows think about the 10-to-8 decision in the Senate lately, filed just last week, about the Supreme Court. That 10-to-8 decision will stand out for all time as one of the greatest decisions ever rendered for the protection of our Constitution and form of government; and if the President could, he would change that decision today, and you will find out that he is going to try to do something with the Senate when he gets you down to Jefferson Island on Friday and Saturday of this week and Sunday of next week. The New Dealers will all be there; and as for the Jefferson Democrats, are you fellows going to follow them down there and be contaminated with a lot of New Deal ideas? It is a pretty serious thing when the President of the United States has to get you together about every week or two and drive it home that he wants you to be rubber stamps. For God's sake, are you not going to use your own initiative and your own minds? If you have any, you ought to do it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I would if I could get the time, but I am afraid it will not be extended. It is very strange to find the President of the United States condemning the Supreme Court, charging that members should resign when 70 years old, when we find him appointing men like Frederic A. Delano, his uncle, who is 74 years old, to a 6-year term on the National Park and Planning Commission; and Mr. R. Walton Moore, who is 78 years old, to be Counselor of the State Department; and having the Senate confirm them. He is just not consistent. He cannot be consistent, when he promises the American people one thing and then is doing something else. I never in all my life knew one who had so little respect for his own words as the President of the United States.

I come to the subject that I want to talk to you about this afternoon. First let me read you the following letter, which explains itself, and the presence of "the evidence" here this afternoon:

THE VIRGIN ISLANDS CO.,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1937.

Hon. ROBERT F. RICH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RICH: I am sending you herewith a laboratory sample of Government House rum, manufactured by the Virgin Islands Co. in St. Croix.

This is the same rum which is about to be marketed through a distributing agency in the United States. It is distilled from pure sugar cane juice under the most modern conditions. The cane was raised by natives of the Virgin Islands in connection with the rehabilitation program, which has been most sucessful in improving the standards of living on the islands.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Chairman, Board of Directors.

If there ever was a time in the history of this Congress when you fellows tried to evade the issue it was this afternoon when you would not permit a vote on the civil service in the C. C. C. You talk about civil service, but you do not mean it. You do not want it. You would not even permit a vote to be had on it, you are afraid to be recorded, and there were not enough Republicans to get a roll call. You talk one thing and do another.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to display a liquor bottle in the House of Representatives.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, this is Government rum, presented to me by Secretary Ickes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no right to exhibit the bottle without permission of the House. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOBEY. The Speaker called the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that the gentleman had a bottle of liquor.

How does the Speaker know it is liquor, sir?

The SPEAKER. That is a question of which the House cannot take judicial notice. The point of order is well taken.

The Chair will submit it to the House, if the gentleman insists on displaying the exhibit.

Mr. MAVERICK. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of granting the gentleman from Pennsylvania the right to exhibit the bottle which he now holds in his hand will say "aye" and those opposed will say "no."

The vote was taken and the Speaker announced that the ayes have it, and the permission is granted. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. RICH. I wish to call attention to this bottle of Government House rum.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PETTENGILL). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. RICH. If it is not taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. RICH. Then I do not yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will waive it.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the design on this bottle of liquor, a ship, according to the record I have here, was suggested to the Secretary of the Interior by the President of the United States. This Government House rum is manufactured by a corporation owned by every individual in the United States who is a taxpayer, and anybody who ever buys anything certainly is a taxpayer. The sole agent is W. A. Taylor & Co. of New York City. Why does the Government confine the sale to one company? The Government, under the New Deal, bought in the Virgin Islands, two old sugar mills, and an old distillery, and 5,000 acres of land. The Government, New Deal, has spent, under W. P. A., $2,520,000 for purchase and to get this Government plant in shape to manufacture rum. They have today, inventory, 600,000 gallons of rum on hand, at $1 a gallon, and 3,800 tons of sugar, at $70 a ton. That would be an inventory of $866,000. That is what you have for the $2,520,000 that you have expended, plus the land and rum mill. Mr. Ickes is president of this company. He is also Secretary of the Interior.

Now, the point is this, that we put the Government in business in more things in the last 4 years than ever in the history of our Nation. Do you not think it is time to take the Government out of business and especially the rum business? The Government is in competition with the distillers of this country who pay taxes. It is in competition with the breweries of this country who are paying taxes to help support this Nation. You are putting the Government into direct competition with them. It is not right to those people. It is not right for any individual citizen of this Government to have the Government in competition with them. I think the time has arrived for you to go back to the promises you made in your platform and that the President made in his speeches. Let me quote the President of the United States from a speech he made in Brooklyn on November 4, 1932:

> The people of America demand a reduction of Federal expenditure. It can be accomplished not only by reducing expenditures of existing departments, but it can be done by abolishing many useless commissions, bureaus, and functions, and it can be done by consolidating many activities of the Government.

Now, if the President meant what he said, then he ought to get the Government out of this business. He ought to get the Government out of many lines of business that it is in today. He ought to try to consolidate offices.

I take my hat off to Senator BYRD. He has been trying in every way he possibly could to consolidate offices. We have a man right here from St. Louis, JACK COCHRAN, who knows more about consolidation of Government offices than anybody else in this House. [Applause.] If he and Senator BYRD will get together they could bring in a bill that you men ought to support for consolidation and economy. I hope you are going to try to carry out these promises, not only the statements of the President but the statements in your Democratic platform, where you claim we ought to eliminate the Government in business? Have you the will to do it? Have you the backbone to do it?

Mr. Speaker, we have come to the point not only where we find the Government in business but to the point where the daily financial statement of the Treasury is very disquieting. In this connection I want to call your attention to the recent statement of the majority leader of the Senate and to the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] a few weeks ago on economy in Government. It is too serious a matter to laugh at when you have jumped the Federal deficit, according to the statement of the Treasury, up to $36,833,907,802.90. The highest in our history and still mounting. It is no laughing matter, it is serious; and I want to plead with you, I want to ask you with all the seriousness that I possess, to take the Government out of business, to get it out of these activities where it loses money every day. I want to ask you to cut down governmental expenses. I ask you to remember that you have now appropriated over $8,000,000,000 at this session of Congress for 1938.

June 30, for the fiscal year 1937, you are going to be over $2,800,000,000 in the red, this at the end of the year during which the President promised that he would balance the Budget. Do you expect him to do it? Your President now is figuring on what the expenditures for 1939 are going to be. If he has a Congress of New Dealers instead of a Congress of Jeffersonian Democrats, we will never get any place with economy in Government.

I ask you in closing to give every consideration to the necessity that you take the Government out of the field of business, as one means of economy.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PETTENGILL). Under special order of the House heretofore made the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the speech just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is not my desire to detain the House. I yield back the time allotted to me.

Mr. GILDEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILDEA. Mr. Speaker, when my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] asked permission to address the House today, Monday, June 21, I was interested to know on what subject he might choose to lecture this body.

Doubly interested, because if he elected to berate the C. I. O. as an agency of the New Deal, I believed you would want to know that on Friday of last week a delegation came down here to Washington from the gentleman's mill in Pennsylvania to ask action on the part of the National Labor Relations Board on a complaint filed with the district office of that Board at Philadelphia charging discrimination and coercion on the part of the Woolrich Woolen Mills against certain employees of that company.

The charge was signed by Austin C. Derr, district representative of the Textile Workers Organizing Committee; and in the charge was stated:

> Complaint against Woolrich Woolen Mills charging violations of section 8, subsections (1) and (3) of the National Labor Act by reason of discrimination in tenure of employment, also coercion through the discharge of four workers, namely, Lloyd Verbeck, Martin Myers, James Warren, and Harold Bicket, and the demotion of Albert Geise, said suspension and demotion being as of June 1, 1937.

These men have been long-time workers with the Woolrich Woolen Co. Their dismissal can hardly be laid to lack of experience or inefficiency. This afternoon, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] condemned certain

New Deal legislation and referred to split decisions of the Supreme Court, he failed to mention that the Wagner Act stood up under a split decision and that coercion and discrimination today are branded as unfair labor practices, applicable to the Woolrich Woolen Co. as well as to all other industrial concerns throughout the United States.

Conditions imposed by industry on labor make union organization necessary.

"Where are we going to get the money?" is the challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania continuously hurls at the Members of Congress and at the President of the United States.

We might take a note from the book of the Woolrich Woolen Co., and by assessing everything in sight answer that question to the satisfaction of the gentleman propounding it, if not to the satisfaction of the country.

The Woolrich Woolen Co. deducts from the pay envelopes of its employees—and I quote from the printed slip on the outside of the envelope—these items:

House rent, water rent, lights, insurance, garage rent, store account, Federal O. A. B. tax.

Leaving, as can be noted from the envelopes of two employees which I hold in my hand, absolutely nothing in the way of cash money in the instance of one—Clarence Baker—and very meager cash balance in the envelope of Lloyd Verbeck. Incidentally, Mr. Verbeck is one of the employees dismissed because he had the effrontery to attempt to organize the workers of the Woolrich mill, and I have also been informed the reason Mr. Geise was demoted and not dismissed was because his company-store bill was too high to warrant his dismissal without giving him a chance to work it off.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, with the suggestion that if the President really wants to know where we are going to get the money, he can learn from the Woolrich Woolen Co. Take everything the country earns, and evict as undesirable any who question the procedure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I again rise to call attention to some matters with which I think the Members and the public should be acquainted, if they are not already acquainted with what is going on in our country. Public opinion in this country is both shocked and amazed at the cruel execution of one Helmuth Hirsch, the 21-year-old American who was convicted and executed in spite of repeated appeals by the Government of the United States to the dictator of Germany, whose name I discovered was not originally Hitler, but Herr Schuckelgruber. That was his name before he controlled the German situation. That was his name before he took the name Hitler, under which he is known as the man who is seeking to bring about the world's destruction.

This boy was convicted after a secret hearing in a so-called people's court, where under the German laws no rules of evidence apply and here any plea can be meted out without any regard to law or justice.

This is another instance of dictatorial brutality. Orders are given and a secret trial held, and before one realizes it his head is on the block, and the ruthless machine of dictatorship pursues its merry course again.

A special dispatch to the New York Times from Berlin under date of June 4, 1937, says:

The utmost secrecy surrounded the execution as it did the trial. To this day virtually nothing is known of the evidence against Hirsch presented to the people's tribunal.

It is most amazing to find in this day and age a country which lays claim to being a civilized community behaving in a manner such as Germany has done during this so-called trial. No evidence of any kind was presented to the public, and it is perfectly obvious that no such evidence was in existence. It reminds me very much of the famous purge of June 30, 1934, when Hitler caused the execution of a hundred or so persons, and when called to task for his act, he bluntly announced that he was the "chief judge of the nation." Not only is he the chief judge of the nation but also the sole and exclusive jury. If anything in Germany displeases its ruler, all he has to do is to order a trial and have the man executed.

The amazing thing about this situation is that even representatives of the American Government had been unable to obtain from Germany a copy of the alleged evidence against this young boy, and the dispatch to the New York Times says, "A record of the evidence has been promised to the United States Embassy for its own information at some future date." And when the American consul requested the prison authorities to let him see the condemned boy before he was executed, he was refused admission on the plea that the condemned boy did not want to see him.

Instances like this are unfortunately not unique in Germany. Nearly every day presents some instance of outrages committed under the guise of law against inoffensive persons. Anyone reading about what is going on in Germany today can only hark back to the Middle Ages and the torture chambers of the Spanish Inquisition to find a parallel. The amazing thing in this whole situation is not so much the disregard of all rules of decency and propriety in Germany but the fact that in spite of all these activities, Germany finds itself so slighted and sulked if any criticisms of its actions finds its way into the newspapers.

I venture the prediction that one of the reasons why Germany is so brazen about its actions in this matter is because this boy was merely a citizen of the United States. If he were a British subject, I dare say Hitler would think twice before he would allow this execution to be carried out, because he knows that any such action would result in reprisals and retaliation. But we are easygoing about things and have never done anything to hurt the feelings of the German Chancelor outside of making feeble and ineffectual protests, and even these slight protestations Germany cannot "take."

The powers that be in Germany refuse to listen to the truth and if an impartial newspaper dares to utter a word of criticism, it is immediately barred from circulation in Germany and the nation to which the paper belongs is assailed and assaulted.

Germany will brook no criticism of its actions, and at the same time is most vitriolic in denouncing other nations.

My question is, "How long, O Lord, how long" is this going to continue?

Mr. Speaker, I wonder what is wrong with us and why we, as a nation, are not entitled to the same courtesy as other nations from this Herr Schuckelgruber, commonly known as Hitler. I am not quarreling with his form of government in Germany, but I do want to call attention to just a few facts concerning the activities of his agents carried on in this country in the way of the most pernicious and un-American activities.

In Chicago, Ill., where they are pretty well organized, in which State the State militia ought to be checked into by somebody, whether it be by the Governor of the State or some committee, there are these alien German spies who are fomenting trouble. One of their headquarters is at Northbrook, Ill. I repeat the name of that place, Northbrook, Ill. At that place are located several thousand German Nazis in uniform. They have ammunition. They are drilling both by foot and in the air, and it is all done by order of the German Government.

Mr. Speaker, before these men are accepted into the aviation outfit their applications must be sent to the German consul in New York, who in turn sends the application to the War Department in Germany. If the man is approved, the application is returned to the German consul in New York, who in turn notifies the alien secret spy system of Illinois. The man is then made a member of the aviation outfit.

I am going to surprise some of my associates in a very few days. I was able to obtain a moving picture photograph of many hundreds and maybe thousands of men who have taken up arms, who have taken belts with guns and bullets. Some of this outfit with bullets and belts took these pictures for the purpose of sending them to Germany to prove to Hitler that they are well organized in the United States of America and that they are ready at any time to carry out his will and his commands upon call.

Pictures do not lie. Here is the madman of the world trying to destroy every race of people. He started with the Jews; he then picked on the Catholics; he is now trying to destroy the Protestants. He has appointed a god of his own. He is the whole boss and the dictator. He not alone confines his propaganda to his own country, which I have no objection to, but he puts out this propaganda in every section of the world. What I am concerned with is to get some form to stop this drilling and arming of a group of foreign agitators in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Members of Congress. This is not my job alone. I am calling this to the attention of the Members because I have practically slept with this problem for 3 years. I have definite, positive proof, backed up by pictures. Northbrook, Ill., is the place where they are drilling in German uniforms. They have ammunition, and they have airplanes. They have horses and a cavalry ready to go over to Germany to bring about another World War. Yet we say we are a neutral people; we do not want war. . What are they doing over here? Are we going to sit back and tolerate this? Where are these Members who on April 8 voted down my investigation? Why do they not do something? I will join with them. Why do they not suggest a remedy? They have destroyed my suggestion. .I am willing to work with them, and I do not have to talk very much to convince any reasonable man what they are doing in Northbrook, Ill. They are going to do the same in New York City and other places.

Here is a paper that is published by the German Government in this country. This paper was issued last Wednesday. In the German language an order is issued by Mr. William Goer, district leader of the New Nazi Party, calling upon all Germans or all Hitlerites to appear at a convention some place in my own State, somewhere out in the woods, and by orders of their leaders they are to bring their German uniforms and they must be ready to carry out the orders from without.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman in his quotation said an order had been issued to "all Germans" or "all Hitlerites." I assume he was making a correction and does not mean "all Germans."

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I did not mean all Germans. I mean all Hitlerites. I agree with the gentleman. The committee which investigated un-American activities in this country has no quarrel with the German people. In fact, our committee gives them an excellent report and states they are loyal Americans. It is the newcomers in the last 3 or 4 years—and we have had thousands of them—who have created most of the trouble. They no more pledge allegiance to this country than I would pledge allegiance to Hitler. They are not interested in this country. We are allowing them under our very noses to carry on this drilling in uniform. We permit them to carry arms. They are ready to serve this madman who is ready now, if you want to know it, to declare war against everybody.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does not the Governor of Illinois know all about this, and does not our own State Department know about it, and have we not laws to take care of the situation?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I agree with the gentleman. They should know about it, but they do not know because we always mind our own business. We never go into these things. We are asleep.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is in our own country. It is up to us to find out.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I agree with the gentleman, it should be made our business. There should be a standing committee of this House known as the Committee on un-American Activities, which should watch every subversive group in this country—and that applies to the Communists and all other groups that seek to overthrow this Government in one form or another. I say in answer to the gentleman, the Governor of Illinois should know it, the State police should know it, and the country should know it, but they do not take the trouble to find out, and these people are carrying on.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BOYER. I am interested in the State of Illinois. I represent a district in Illinois. I do not know where the town of Northbrook is. Will the gentleman tell me where it is? What part of the State is it in?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I cannot give the gentleman the description, but I shall be very glad to furnish it. I have some affidavits and some documents here, and I shall be glad to have the gentleman locate it for me.

Let me call your attention to something else that is very interesting. Only about 3 or 4 weeks ago some groups, both Fascists and Loyalists, have taken from this country several hundred young Americans by soliciting their aid to join the war in Spain.

They have been taken away from their mothers and fathers. I do not have to tell you it takes very little salesmanship to induce a boy to put on a uniform and to go on a big boat and fight over there. There are recruiting stations upon recruiting stations in this country. Can any man in this House or in this country tell me, should it not be our business to stop it? Have we done anything to stop it? Eighty percent of the boys who were taken over there have already been killed. Have we done anything to be neutral? No. Are we interfering with them? Are we interfering with Germany? No. But Germany is interfering in this country every day in the week.

I venture to say the trouble in Palestine is the result of Mr. Hitler's propaganda. The trouble in Poland is the result of Hitler's maneuvers and propaganda. The taking of Danzig and, pretty soon, Austria, is the work of propaganda. Naturally they could get along much faster in those countries than they can in this country.

Mr. Speaker, my appeal to this House is, Why should we as Americans tolerate any form of "isms" in this country which brings hatred, ill feeling, and fear into the hearts of millions of American citizens who are becoming victims of this propaganda? I am not quarreling with the Members of the House, and I am not criticizing your action. I am merely stating the facts to you. I would be willing to cooperate with any Member or group of Members to submit all the information I have received, because unfortunately I get it every day in the week. However, I submit something ought to be done to eradicate all of these people who seek in one form or another to bring about the rise of foreign idealogies and foreign thoughts. Such people ought to be removed from this country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

CONTROL OF CANCER

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill which is known as the cancer bill, H. R. 6767. It provides for cancer research, the training of technicians, and the establishment of a central cancer clinic. On Sunday I read a review in the New York Times of a book entitled "Cancer—The Great Darkness", prepared by the editors of Fortune. The introduction is written by Morris Fishbein, Fellow of the American Medical Association. (See below I, Comment by Dr. Morris Fishbein.)

This book tells us a great deal about cancer research in this country. I have been reading the book since I sent out and got it this morning, and it has been scaring me to death. It is a valuable book; it answers some important questions. (See below II, Important Questions Answered by Fortune.)

In the last hour I have done some figuring; I find that according to established statistics that 60 Members of the present Congress, including both the Senate and the House, will inevitably die of cancer. So this is bringing it close to home. One out of every eight persons over 40 who die, die of cancer. As most of us are over 40, I have figured there will be around 60 of us who thus meet death.

GREATEST HINDRANCE—LACK OF FUNDS FOR RESEARCH AND LABORATORIES

This book states the greatest hindrance to the war against cancer is lack of sufficient funds to support the necessary laboratories and research workers. Nevertheless, the American people spend more money on a football afternoon in October than is available in the whole United States for carrying on the fight against this great disease. Think of that, my colleagues.

The book goes on to explain something which I already knew—that one of the reasons people evade the question of cancer is that it absolutely grips them with horror and fear, so they evade the question.

COTTON, $846,000 PER ANNUM FOR RESEARCH; CANCER, $95,000

According to this book concerning the amount of money spent on research, on cotton we spend $846,000 a year; on forest products, $507,000 a year; and on dairy cattle, $387,000. Then there are numerous others, on all of which we spend more than we do on cancer. The average amount we have spent for the last 10 years on cancer is $95,000. (See below III, Foundations on Cancer.)

It is generally recognized throughout the United States that much more money must be spent on cancer research if any progress is to be made at all. The figures I have cited are enough to prove it. But let me read further:

Fortune believes that the eventual solution for cancer can be hastened by financial assistance. Laboratories cannot create genius but they can prepare the way. And laboratories presume money, and money presumes a public interest that the cancer people have failed to enlist.

The bill which I have introduced provides for spending $2,400,000 for a central cancer clinic, which would be established in Washington, D. C., free from any political influence, under the Public Health Service. It also provides for spending a million dollars a year. The Service would coordinate the cancer work of the United States. They find that cancer work west of the Mississippi River is very poorly organized, and is principally organized in the East and New England States. The Service would provide for the distribution of radium and other facilities all over the United States, in a proper way.

This project is not opposed by any member of the medical profession, as far as I know. All of the leading cancer specialists of the United States, including Dr. James Ewing, Dr. C. C. Little, and Dr. George Morris Dorrance, in Philadelphia, and various others, are in favor of this work. Hundreds of doctors have specifically endorsed the bill, including Dr. William Mayo of the famous Mayos' Clinic.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Would the gentleman include tuberculosis?

CANCER KNOWN FOR 3,000 YEARS—BUT CAUSE UNKNOWN

Mr. MAVERICK. Of course; but they are doing good work on tuberculosis now and great strides have already been made. The disease is under control. Also, they are doing good work on syphilis, and it is under control. May I also say to the gentleman that cancer has been known as a disease for 3,000 years, but no one has ever been able to ascertain its cause.

No one, my friends, has ever found a cause for cancer.

The cause of syphilis is known and it is also known there is a cure for it in a certain phase. The same may be said of tuberculosis and other diseases. Those diseases are known, gentlemen; in syphilis we have the Wassermann test—but there is nothing like that in cancer. The lack of a cure is the reason cancer is called "The Great Darkness."

It just happens that I anticipated that question, and I would like to read two short paragraphs:

The basic reason for the rise in cancer mortality is that medical research in other fields has outstripped medical research in cancer.

Also, my friends, I read on another page:

What the public wants and what the public will never get until research accomplishes a miracle is some cure such as salvarsan provides for syphilis, quinine for malaria, antitoxin for diphtheria. Cancer has nothing like that.

This last quotation explains my reference to the Wassermann test.

FINANCE THE BRAINS AND EQUIPMENT TO FIGHT CANCER

Let me quote from the conclusion of the book:

So, in the end, darkness broods upon cancer. And until the cancer laboratory creates a light that mankind has never before seen, darkness will remain. This is the pessimistic conclusion to which any honest analysis of the cancer situation leads by relentless syllogisms.

And yet the pessimism of the conclusion is in a sense relative. The history of cancer research, as we have reviewed it, is a brilliant history of men working under difficulties, from whose labors some sparks have been struck.

Society has within it the power, if not directly to call forth light from those sparks, at least to finance the brains and equipment by which it might conceivably be called forth. This is a thing which society has not done—which it must do.

HERE IS A CHANCE TO REALLY SERVE HUMANITY

I call upon you to be interested in cancer and do everything you can to combat it. Let us get this bill on the floor, appropriate the money. I have a feeling every Member of Congress favors this bill, but it still lies in the committee. Let us have hearings—let us know the real truth.

If this bill is adopted we can truly say we have done a service to humanity.

COMMENT BY DR. MORRIS FISHBEIN

Education of public is of greatest importance

Dr. Morris Fishbein, able Fellow of the American Medical Association, writes the introduction to the book and, therefore, endorses its representations. He recognizes, as all doctors recognize, the importance of the subject. He compliments the editors of Fortune and gives the following important advice:

The editors of Fortune have rendered a service to medicine and the public by the extremely lucid explanation and review of our present knowledge of cancer included in the excellent article which forms the bulk of the content of this book. The one real hope in cancer under present conditions is early diagnosis and early operation, or else the use of the X-ray or of radium, or perhaps a combination of all three methods. Statistical evidence accumulated in many places proves the truth of this statement.

Dr. Fishbein also emphasizes the need of public education, prompt treatment, and diagnosis as follows:

In cancer particularly, therefore, education of the public is of the greatest importance; it should lead to earlier diagnosis and more prompt action in relationship to control of the cancerous growth. It has been said that the chief items which any person over 40 should keep in mind about cancer are four in number:

(1) Early cancers can be cured.
(2) Everyone is liable to cancer.
(3) Diagnosis demands scientific knowledge.
(4) Consult a physician on the slightest suspicion of the presence of cancerous growths.

II

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS ANSWERED BY FORTUNE

1. What is being done to discover the cause of cancer?

Criminally little. This is largely due to public apathy and ignorance. If this book, in even the smallest measure, aids in overcoming that apathy and ignorance its publication will be thoroughly justified.

2. Are deaths from cancer increasing?

Yes. The cancer mortality rate has increased 60 percent in this century!

3. Is cancer infectious—is it hereditary?

Probably not. But you will have to wait until science somewhere finds the money to carry on the necessary research work to prove this before you can be sure.

4. How long has cancer been recognized, if so little is known about it?

About 3,000 years. This book reveals that the ancient Egyptians used remedies as effective as many modern nostrums.

5. Are quack cures still sold?

Yes. If this book can play a part in starting legislation to stop one of the most cruel frauds ever practiced on the American public it will have further justified its publication.

III

FOUNDATIONS ON CANCER

Sums spent "criminally little" in comparison to needs

I insert here from the book information concerning what research is being done. Cancer—The Great Darkness, says that there is a loosely held belief that a tremendous effort is being made to solve the cancer problem, but that "unhappily, such is not the case", and that "the amount of money provided for the search for cancer causes is dramatically small."

It is also emphasized that the work is scattered throughout 48 States; that much of the work is repetitive, some of it elementary, and not a little of it wasted. It proceeds concerning the various foundations:

In the entire cancer field there are only two funds whose capitalizations are in excess of $1,000,000. The biggest is the International Cancer Research Foundation founded in Philadelphia in 1932 by William H. Donner with a capital of $2,000,000, which that shrewd ex-steel master (Donner Steel, Republic Steel) has ably administered ever since. Headed by Mr. Donner, an advisory committee of scientists, and a board of trustees, the foundation's income is parceled out to a number of cancer-research projects in various parts of the world.

The next biggest fund is that of the Crocker Cancer Research Fund, of New York, created by the will of George Crocker in 1911 with a capital of $1,400,000, and headed by the distinguished cancer authority, Dr. Francis Carter Wood. The income from this fund goes entirely to Columbia University's Institute of Cancer Research, which is therefore the most heavily endowed cancer research organization in the United States.

Smaller funds are the $650,000 Anna Fuller fund of New Haven; the $400,000 Jonathan Bowman fund at the University of Wisconsin; the $200,000 Henry Rutherford fund at the Rockefeller Institute, which aids the Institute's division of cancer research, headed by Dr. James B. Murphy; the $100,000 C. P. Huntington fund, which goes to New York's Memorial Hospital, headed by the renowned Dr. James Ewing (but of $500,000 spent on cancer by this institution in 1936, only $50,000 went to research); the $100,000 Bondy fund at Columbia University; the $100,000 Charles F. Spang Foundation, whose income goes to the University of Pittsburgh's medical school; and the $100,000 Mack Memorial Foundation, which is partly for cancer research and goes entirely to the University of California.

All other funds in the field are less than $100,000. A vital unit in the research field is Dr. Clarence Cook Little's laboratory in Bar Harbor, Maine (the Roscoe B. Jackson Memorial Laboratory), which has virtually no working capital at all save that which Dr. Little raises by personal efforts. Dr. Little breeds pedigreed mice and sells about 50,000 of them a year to cancer researchers.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, my only purpose in rising on this occasion is because I have listened with great interest to the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] with reference to his cancer bill, and I wish to call the attention of the House at this time to the fact that there are pending in the House and Senate numerous cancer bills, the most prominent of which is one introduced in the Senate and signed by 94 Senators, which was likewise introduced in the House by myself sometime previous to the introduction of the bill of the gentleman from Texas.

There are to be public hearings in the Senate on this bill, and these hearings are to take place within the next month. I have no quarrel with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK], or any other Member of the House, and what the gentleman points out is absolutely correct, and there should be something done in the matter.

I spent the last week-end at Bar Harbor with Dr. Little, one of the most eminent specialists in the United States, and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] has stated, they are all in agreement about the matter.

I want the House at this time to be informed of the fact that within the next month we are going to try, in conjunction with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] and anyone else who may be interested, to get action in the matter, and I shall be pleased to cooperate with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] in support of his bill.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. JACOBSEN, was not able to be present today when the bill H. R. 7519, the railroad retirement bill, was under consideration. He was absent on official business. Had he been present, he would have voted "yea" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, when the railroad retirement bill was voted upon this afternoon I was necessarily absent from the Chamber. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GILDEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon and to include therein the authority from which I derived the statements I made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 713. An act to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 22, 1937, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of the firearms subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Tuesday, June 22, 1937, for the consideration of S. 3, firearms bill.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization Wednesday, June 23, 1937, at 10:30 a. m., on H. R. 4710 and H. R. 4353, H. R. 4354, H. R. 4355, and H. R. 4356 (Starnes). Executive session.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will hold a public hearing in room 219, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., Tuesday, June 29, 1937, at 10 a. m., on H. R. 6039 and H. R. 7309, known as the Fishery Credit Act bills.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 10 a. m. Tuesday, June 29, 1937, on H. R. 5182 and H. R. 6917, textile bills.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

674. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, a letter from the Chairman, Securities and Exchange Commission, transmitting a further part of the Commission's study and investigation of the work, activities, personnel, and functions of protective and reorganization committees, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. HILL of Washington: Committee on Indian Affairs. H. R. 4290. A bill to authorize acquisition of complete title to the Puyallup Indian Tribal School property at Tacoma, Wash., for Indian sanatorium purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 1070). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOUGHTON: Committee on Ways and Means. H. R. 7589. A bill to levy an excise tax upon carriers and certain other employers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 1071). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7430) for the relief of Mary Lucia Haven; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 5259) for the relief of John S. Monahan; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 6531) for the relief of Bertha Hymes Sternfeld; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 6992) for the relief of John Toko; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 7065) granting a pension to Georgia A. Tinney; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7097) for the relief of Minnie D. Gadle; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 7121) for the relief of Ella B. Kimball; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 7169) for the relief of Sanford N. Schwartz; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 7303) for the relief of David W. Morgan; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DOUGHTON: A bill (H. R. 7589) to levy an excise tax upon carriers and certain other employers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: A bill (H. R. 7590) to quiet title and possession to certain islands in the Tennessee River in the counties of Colbert and Lauderdale, Ala.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DUNCAN: A bill (H. R. 7591) to make available to each State enacting in 1937 an unemployment-compensation law a portion of the proceeds from the Federal employers' tax in such State for the years of 1936 and 1937; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CANNON of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 7592) to regulate the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. STEAGALL: A bill (H. R. 7593) to provide for the establishment of Fort Mitchell National Park in Russell County, Ala.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. VINSON of Georgia: A bill (H. R. 7594) to give the United States Board of Tax Appeals jurisdiction to decide controverted questions relating to manufacturers' excise taxes in certain cases; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BEITER: A bill (H. R. 7595) to provide that the wording of Medals of Honor and accompanying certificates for blind ex-service men shall be in Braille; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DISNEY: A bill (H. R. 7596) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the Neosho River and its tributaries in the States of Kansas and Oklahoma with a view to the control of its floods; to the Committee on Flood Control.

By Mr. ALLEN of Delaware: A bill (H. R. 7597) to provide for the construction of a highway bridge across Chesapeake Bay at the most advantageous location in the immediate vicinity of Annapolis, Md., and Matapeake, Md.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HOFFMAN: A bill (H. R. 7598) to amend the act of June 24, 1936, the same being chapter 746, United States Statutes at Large, entitled "An act making it a felony to transport in interstate or foreign commerce persons to be employed to obstruct or interfere with the right of peaceful picketing during labor controversies" by adding four new sections thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 7599) to provide for the acquisition of all additional, suitable, and appropriate acreage necessary for a national historical park at Fort Necessity site (Fayette County, Pa.); to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DEMPSEY: A resolution (H. Res. 246) to provide for inquiry into the administration of law in Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JUNE 22, 1937

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 15, 1937)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Monday, June 21, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. I note the absence of a quorum, and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Johnson, Colo.	Reynolds
Andrews	Connally	La Follette	Robinson
Ashurst	Copeland	Lee	Russell
Austin	Davis	Lewis	Schwartz
Bailey	Dieterich	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Duffy	Logan	Smathers
Barkley	Ellender	Longeran	Smith
Bilbo	Frazier	Lundeen	Steiwer
Black	George	McAdoo	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	Gerry	McGill	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Gibson	McKellar	Townsend

Chavez	Johnson, Calif.	Radcliffe

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BERRY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

Mr. POPE. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is detained from the Senate because of a slight illness.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

RETIREMENT OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, yesterday the House of Representatives, with but one dissenting vote, passed the bill (H. R. 7519) to establish a retirement system for employees of the railroads. As a similar Senate bill (S. 2395) has been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce and is now on the Senate calendar, the bill passed by the House, under our rules may be placed on the calendar without reference to the committee.

I desire to give notice, if Senators wish to study the bill, that on tomorrow, in the course of the day, I hope to bring the bill up for the consideration of the Senate. I do not anticipate any opposition to it in the Senate, since on two other occasions similar bills were passed by unanimous vote of the Senate.

REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter signed by the Chairman and secretary of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, reporting, pursuant to law, relative to the operations of the Corporation for the first quarter of 1937, and also for the period from the organization of the Corporation on February 2, 1932, to March 31, 1937, inclusive, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the petition of Julio Villalobos and several other citizens of Colon, Republic of Panama, praying that compensation be granted them for lands acquired by the Government of the United States in connection with the acquisition of the Panama Canal Zone, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Springfield, Mass., praying for the abolition of the Federal Reserve System as at present constituted, and also praying that Congress exercise its constitutional right to coin money and regulate the value thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Herrick Labor Club (affiliated with the American Labor Party), of Richmond County, N. Y., protesting against the enactment of the bill (S. 25) to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense, and promote peace, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Fifth A. D. Bronx Branch of the American Labor Party, New York City, favoring declaration by the Government of the United States of the existence of a state of war between the Spanish Republic and the Governments of Germany and Italy, and also the placing of embargoes on all munitions and other implements of war against such alleged belligerents, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, assembled in annual convention at Newark, N. J., favoring the enactment of the bill (H. R. 6391) to authorize the prompt deportation of criminals and certain other aliens, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a recent meeting in Albany, N. Y., by representatives of various civic organizations from the cities in which collegiate centers are located, favoring the appropriation of funds for the continuance of emergency collegiate centers in New York State, which was ordered to lie on the table.

DEDICATION OF CHAPELS AND OTHER WORLD WAR MEMORIALS

Mr. GLASS. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 415. It is a noncontroversial measure, proposing to appropriate $175,000 to the American Battle Monuments Commission for the dedication of chapels and other World War memorials in France.

The joint resolution also contains a transfer of $40,000 from one branch of the Department of Justice, which does not need it, to another branch, which does need it, and, further, it makes a correction of $80 in an engrossed act. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I presume it will be necessary to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside, and I ask that that be done in order that the joint resolution may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia for the present consideration of the joint resolution reported by him?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 415) making an appropriation to defray expenses incident to the dedication of chapels and other World War memorials erected in Europe, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of providing for the dedication of the chapels and other World War memorials erected in Europe under the authority of the act of March 4, 1923 (42 Stat. 1509), there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $175,000, to remain available until June 30, 1938, and to be available for expenditure by the American Battle Monuments Commission for such objects and in such manner as the Commission may deem necessary and proper to accomplish the purposes hereof without regard to the provisions of other laws or regulations relating to the expenditure of public funds except that this exemption shall not be construed as waiving the requirement for the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit. The Commission may utilize the services, materials, supplies, equipment, and other facilities of any other agency of the Government when, in the discretion of such other agency, it is convenient and practicable to furnish the same, the cost thereof to be paid from this appropriation, except that when, in the discretion of the furnishing agency, the public interest will be subserved thereby such services, materials, supplies, equipment, and other facilities may be furnished free of charge to the Commission. The Commission may, within such limits and under such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, delegate to its chairman, secretary, or other designated representatives such of its authority as it may deem necessary and proper in carrying out the purposes hereof. The official delegation designated by the Commission to attend such dedication shall include three Members of the United States Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President or the President pro tempore of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce, to transfer, during the fiscal year 1937, from the appropriation "Salaries and general expenses for the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, fiscal year 1937", to the appropriation "Departmental salaries, Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, fiscal year 1937", not to exceed $8,000.

SEC. 3. There is hereby transferred from the appropriation "Fees of jurors and witnesses, United States courts, 1937" to the appropriation "Pay of special assistant attorneys, United States courts, 1937", the amount of $40,000.

SEC. 4. The appropriation in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1938 (Public Act No. 94, 75th Cong.), for an assistant clerk at $2,800 for the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, is hereby amended to make the salary of such assistant clerk read "$2,880."

SEC. 5. The Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to approve payment for nine airplanes obtained from the Stinson Aircraft Corporation, Wayne, Mich., under contract Cc-2510, dated October 1, 1936, out of an allotment of $83,000 made by the President of the United States on March 23, 1937, for this purpose from the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935.

The figure here given is the actual amount expended.

This act made available such an amount as was necessary in the judgment of the President.

A total of $880,000,000 was reappropriated under this act but $345,551,385 of this amount was taken from unspent balances of earlier discretionary appropriations already listed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills and joint resolution of the Senate:

S. 119. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Menominee, Mich.;

S. 187. An act providing for the suspension of annual assessment work on mining claims held by location in the United States;

S. 1374. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Manistique, Mich.;

S. 1984. An act for the protection of the northern Pacific halibut fishery;

S. 2242. An act to further amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the collection and editing of official papers of the Territories of the United States now in The National Archives", approved March 3, 1925, as amended;

S. 2439. An act to extend the time for purchase and distribution of surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes and to continue the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation; and

S. J. Res. 111. Joint resolution to provide that the United States extend to foreign governments invitations to participate in the International Congress of Architects to be held in the United States during the calendar year 1939, and to authorize an appropriation to assist in meeting the expenses of the session.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate, each with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 4. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the original Norfolk (Va.) land grant and the two hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the city of Norfolk, Va., as a borough; and

S. 102. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam.

The message further announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6551) to establish a Civilian Conservation Corps, and for other purposes, and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 1561. An act for the protection of oyster culture in Alaska;

H. R. 1961. An act to authorize the conveyance by the United States to the State of Wisconsin of a portion of the Twin River Point Lighthouse Reservation, and for other purposes;

H. R. 4011. An act to confer jurisdiction upon certain United States commissioners to try petty offenses committed on Federal reservations;

H. R. 4087. An act to reduce by 100,000 the number of 50-cent pieces authorized to be coined in celebration of the opening of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge, and to authorize the coinage of not to exceed 100,000, 50-cent pieces in celebration of the opening of the Golden Gate Bridge;

H. R. 4343. An act to amend section 77B of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended;

H. R. 4716. An act authorizing the construction and equipment of a marine hospital in the State of Florida;

H. R. 4721. An act relative to granting and giving instructions in civil and criminal cases in the district courts of continental United States;

H. R. 4852. An act to provide for the creation of the Saratoga National Historical Park in the State of New York, and for other purposes;

H. R. 5040. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near Beaver Bay, Minn.;

H. R. 5140. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near St. Augustine, Fla.;

H. R. 5963. An act providing for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York at Malone, N. Y.;

H. R. 6176. An act to admit to the United States certain alien veterans of the World War;

H. R. 6358. An act to amend section 107, as amended, of the Judicial Code so as to eliminate the requirement that suitable accommodations for holding court at Columbia, Tenn., be provided by the local authorities;

H. R. 6453. An act to increase the minimum salary of deputy United States marshals to $2,000 per annum;

H. R. 6496. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Montana, or the counties of Roosevelt, Richland, and McCone, singly or jointly, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Missouri River, at or near Poplar, Mont.;

H. R. 6607. An act to provide for the naturalization of certain alien spouses of citizens of the United States, and to validate the naturalization of certain persons;

H. R. 6636. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Carroll, in the State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Wabash River at or near Lockport, Ind.;

H. R. 6693. An act to legalize a dike in the Missouri River 6⁹⁄₁₀ miles downstream from the South Dakota State highway bridge at Pierre, S. Dak.;

H. R. 6737. An act to amend the stamp provisions of the Bottling in Bond Act;

H. R. 6762. An act to amend the act known as the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, approved June 10, 1930, as amended;

H. R. 6920. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Middlesex County, and the city of Lowell, Mass., or any two of them, or any one of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Merrimack River at Lowell;

H. R. 7017. An act to amend section 4450 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of May 27, 1936 (49 Stat. 1380, 1383; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 46, sec. 239);

H. R. 7328. An act to authorize an appropriation to carry out the provisions of the act of May 3, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 484), and for other purposes;

H. R. 7401. An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to convey to the Commissioners of the Palisades Interstate Park, a body politic of the State of New York, certain portions of the Stony Point Light Station Reservation, Rockland County, N. Y., including certain appurtenant structures, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 7519. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes", approved August 29, 1935.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 713) to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES COMMEMORATIVE OF SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF BATTLE OF ANTIETAM

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 102) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam, which were on, page 1, line 4, to strike out "a" and insert "one"; on page 1, line 4, after "mint", to insert "only"; and on page 2, line 10, after "Maryland", to insert "subject to the approval of the Director of the Mint."

Mr. TYDINGS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES COMMEMORATIVE OF THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ORIGINAL NORFOLK, VA., LAND GRANT, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the original Norfolk (Va.) land grant and the two hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the city of Norfolk, Va., as a borough, which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "a" and insert "one"; on page 1, line 7, after "mint", to insert "only"; on page 1, line 8, to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five"; on page 2, line 2, after "appropriate", to insert "single"; on page 2, line 13, to strike out "five" and insert "twenty-five"; and on page 2, line 17, after "association" to insert "subject to the approval of the Director of the Mint."

Mr. GLASS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF SECTION 7 (A) OF SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendment of the Senate to House bill 3687, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
June 14, 1937.

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3687) to extend the period during which the purposes specified in section 7 (a) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act may be carried out by payments by the Secretary of Agriculture to producers, with the following amendment:

Omit the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, and on page 2, after line 9, of the House engrossed bill, insert:

"SEC. 2. Section 9 of such act is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: 'The Secretary shall transmit to the Congress a report, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for each fiscal year thereafter, of the operations for such year under sections 7 to 14, inclusive, of this act, which report shall include a statement of the expenditures made and obligations incurred, by classes and amounts.'"

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, when this measure was before the Senate the Senate made one amendment. The House of Representatives has practically agreed to that amendment, adding a few clarifying words. Therefore I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) making appropriations for relief purposes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, on May 11 I introduced Senate bill 2390, to provide relief, work relief, and increase employment by grants to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and has since been available to Senators for study. I shall now offer it as a substitute for the pending joint resolution. I have no illusions as to the reception which the proposed substitute will receive at the hands of the Senate. Previous roll calls have clearly disclosed the purpose of this body not only to cling to the existing relief system but also to defeat any economical limitations. But I am convinced that the substitute represents a philosophy of action which must one day be embraced if the Federal credit shall not ultimately be destroyed. Therefore, to preserve the continuity of the record—for I have offered similar substitutes before—I am presenting the proposal; but, in order to conserve the time of the Senate, which I should like to encourage to the earliest possible sine die adjournment, I shall content myself with the briefest possible argument, and I shall be satisfied with a viva-voce vote.

Mr. President, in a word, this substitute proposes to cure many of the challenging difficulties of the relief problem—difficulties that have been spectacularly emphasized in the debates of the past week—by returning responsibility for relief decisions and for relief administration to the States; and it proposes to save $250,000,000 for the harassed Treasury by making the lesser amount do the work of the larger sum after the needless burden of Federal bureaucracy has been eliminated. A nonpartisan Federal relief board, with the approval of the President, would make one annual allocation of available Federal relief funds to nonpartisan relief commissions in the States on the basis of population, financial resources, unemployment, and living costs. The only requirements would be that each State shall add at least 25 cents to each Federal dollar, and that it shall not divert Federal money to other than the relief program certified to Washington as its purpose. Each State, knowing the limit of its Federal aid for all types of relief, would map its own relief methods within the limitations of its own willingness to supplement the Federal funds. Out of the total Federal fund, $100,000,000 would be held back for emergency distribution. This condensed sketch will suffice for the purpose of this discussion.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that any realistic discussion of the matter falls under two headings. First, have we reached a point where Federal retrenchment in expenditures, including relief expenditures, is irresistibly necessary in the public interest and for that "general welfare" which has been so widely debated the last few days? Second, can we retrench in relief expenditures without unwarrantably penalizing those of our people who are legitimately entitled to relief? If both questions may be answered in the affirmative—and I undertake to say this is the fact—then the substitute is preferable to the pending joint resolution.

Let us deal with the initial question first.

Mr. President, the proof stands too clear for any need of repetition that we must start swiftly to conserve the financial resources of this Government in all aspects, including relief, unless we shall plead guilty to reckless speculation in the public credit. No one has a greater stake in such conservation than those who must depend upon Government for their subsistence, because a solid public credit is their sole reliance. Whenever this reservoir is exhausted, there will be no relief of any amount for anybody. Those who have most eloquently pleaded the cause of the unemployed upon this floor in this debate render grievous disservice to their intended beneficiaries if and when they ignore this axiom. Therefore, it is my deep conviction that the remaining victims of the late depression are best served, in the long view, by those of us who stress the necessity for a restoration of a larger measure of home responsibility and home construction as a means of forcing greater respect for the value of the relief dollar, and as a means of lightening the load upon a Treasury which, despite the greatest public revenue in all history, continues ominously in red ink, and which today faces a colossal debt in excess of 36 staggering billions of dollars.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I might say in passing that today America is "in the red" in more than one sinister meaning of the phrase.

I take the liberty of commending what has been bluntly said upon this subject during the last few days by the distinguished leader of the majority, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and by the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and by the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and others. They may not follow me in the proposal which I submit to implement their logic; but, in my view, their logic has been invincible; and a vital public service has been rendered in the presentation of it. They may disagree with my application of their admonitions, but I cannot escape the feeling that everything that has been said about our pressing need to protect the public credit and to rationally circumscribe relief expenditures argues for a fundamental change in relief methods so that we may economize at the expense of relief administrators and relief experimenters rather than at the expense of legitimate relief clients themselves. I simply assert my belief that their cogent arguments, carried to their logical, ultimate objective, sustain the philosophy of action which I am again proposing in this substitute.

Then, too, I wish approvingly to recall the timely address of the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who on May 24, at page 4971 of the RECORD, found in the Presidential message of that day an occasion to use the following language:

> I congratulate the President that he has found it agreeable now to sound, as it were, a tocsin and a warning that he expects the States to turn to the discharge of their duties in their local governments, and not sit idly by and attempt to put upon the Federal Government the necessity of maintaining them, their counties, their cities, their people out of the Federal Treasury, as though, sir, it were a source to be drawn on for favor or gratuity and ever to be imposed upon because it silently or cowardly accepts that status and yields to it.

But, Mr. President, I fail to understand how the President or any of the rest of us can "expect the States to turn to the discharge of their duties in their local governments", how we can expect to reestablish the vital American principle of home responsibility and home rule, how we can expect to shake loose from the plagues of seeping bureaucracy, how we can hope to circumscribe the false and fatal notion that Federal subsidies are manna from a benevolent heaven which never need be repaid—how we can do any of these things, not to mention a sometime balanced Federal Budget, if the existing relief formula goes on and on and on.

I cannot believe that any Senator will view with equanimity our persistent Federal operating deficits following one another for 7 straight years. In his address yesterday the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] recited numerous methods for balancing the Budget. Indeed, he said "the Budget can be easily balanced." But it is not balanced. Nothing is done about it. If it is an "easy" task, the more discredit to us that it does not happen. If recent Senate roll calls are any criterion, it will not be so "easy."

This year's deficit, despite the biggest Federal income in history, and despite a recovery index which crowds the peaks of 1929, will be larger—think of it—than last year.

Our estimated production index for May is 117 as compared with 119 in 1929. Employment is at the index at 102 as compared with 105 in 1929. Pay rolls are at 105 as compared with 109 in 1929. Yet the index of our national debt raced yesterday to an all-time high.

As the able senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has so well said, How can we ever hope to bring Uncle Sam within his income if it cannot be done under existing auspices, and how can we then ever hope to face another recession with unimpaired resources if we do not bring Uncle Sam within his income now? Indefinitely continued deficits, financed with bond-backed money, pile up the raw materials of a suicidal inflation and tear down the maintained confidence which is its only offset. The relief problem, and particularly experimental relief which too often wastes money on ambitious dreams, is inevitably a key part of this contemplation. Despite the fact that 10,000,000 workers have found jobs since 1933, Federal relief outlays are eight times as high as they were then, while State and local expenditures are twice as high. The increase is due, not to the increase of those in need of relief but to costly forms of work relief and other experiments.

It is all very well to be solicitous lest the fiscal resources of our States and cities and other subdivisions become inadequate to the burdens they must bear. It has been repeatedly reiterated this week that many of these subdivisions have limited their borrowing capacities by self-imposed constitutional restraints. But I do not accept this argument as final in respect to the measure of their relief resources and responsibilities, any more than I would agree that a State is entitled to wash itself free of all such obligation by the simple device of constitutionally saying for itself that it will not borrow for such purposes at all.

But shall those who are so solicitous of local credit entirely ignore the economic fact that there is, too, a limit beyond which the Federal credit may not be safely stretched? Is Federal credit inexhaustible? It is not. And I submit that it is sheer folly to measure the potency of this Federal credit by the superficial test that our new bond issues continue to be oversubscribed in a glutted money market where private investment is dangerously discouraged and where public securities, at any price, are about the only place that these swollen inflationary investment funds may go.

No, Mr. President, I venture the assertion that the Governors of the Federal Reserve bank will take no such easy view; on the contrary, they will tell you, as Governor Eccles did last March 15, that the time has come to quit talking about balancing the Federal Budget and actually to do something about it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator forgive me? I am speaking under limitation of time; and if I have any time left, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But we are asked, "Would you talk arithmetic when citizens are hungry?" No, Mr. President, although it is never prudent wholly to ignore arithmetic. "Would anyone measure money against human souls?" Again, and emphatically, no, although it would be the greatest of all disservice to dependent human souls to one day exhaust the money that feeds and shelters them.

I take it that no Senator would put any obligation ahead of the necessity that none shall go unsheltered or unfed in the United States. That comes first. But, in the face of these associated problems, the practical, the realistic question is: Can we meet this obligation fully and adequately at less expense and with less hazard to the perpetuation of those resources upon which any sort of response to the obligation ultimately depends?

There is a large school of thought in America which answers "yes."

Of course, it is a matter of opinion. Indeed, it is entirely too much a matter of speculation and guesswork since there is persistent and successful resistance to any realistic census of the unemployed and to any adequate investigation of the means we have been federally using to dictate relief from Washington. So we are thrust into the field of opinion. I may be wrong; but I agree emphatically with those who believe that a restoration of State decisions, more substantial local contributions, and a complete restoration of basic State responsibility for relief administration, is the inevitable answer. At least it is worthy of a trial.

It will be resisted, as long as possible, by many local authorities which obviously find it easier to let us struggle with Federal deficits than to struggle with their own. It will be resisted, to the bitter end, by thousands upon thousands of happy bureaucrats who relatively enjoy a personal bonanza out of their well-paid attachment to the relief administrative pay rolls—and who, in some instances, are responsible for whipping up the mayoralty protests which have descended upon the Senate during the past few weeks. It will be resisted by those who might be termed professional relief clients, and who hope to make a life career out of their place upon the rolls. It will be resisted, of course, by all devotees of the authoritarian state. Then, too, it will be resisted in complete good faith by many, whose opinions I entirely respect, who sincerely believe that the existing plans are best.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will proceed on the joint resolution.

I distinctly do not condemn our whole relief adventure. In the beginning it was unavoidably necessary to rush into experimental programs which were bound to involve elements of error. Many fine public works, too, dot this Nation as a result of what has been done. Both the President and Administrators Hopkins and Ickes have borne burdens in this connection almost beyond human endurance. I simply ask, in complete good faith, whether out of our long experience we have not learned some lessons which may now be helpfully capitalized for the benefit of the commonweal before it is too late.

These are some of the advantages which I would expect to flow from the philosophy of action which is embedded in the substitute that I am submitting to the Senate—a plan which would, through a bipartisan national commission, pro rate to bipartisan commissions in each State the State's share of the total Federal relief allotment, subject to a minimum State contribution of at least 25 cents out of each relief dollar; then leaving to each State the decision as to what kind of relief shall be provided, where, when, and how; and leaving to each State the responsibility of administration within its own prospectus.

First. I should expect that this decentralized simplification would relieve relief expenditures of a dreadful and costly burden of duplicated overhead which is inevitable in the existing dual set-up. There would be more of each dollar for the reliefers themselves, or, put differently, fewer dollars would buy the same relief results.

Second. I should expect this exercise of home authority to result in decisions far better suited to intimate local needs than is the case when we try to apply a national formula to local necessities, which cannot be thus regularized in so big and so complex a country as the United States. The very fact that there is such insistence upon earmarking portions of the lump-sum relief appropriation for specific purposes deemed intimately necessary to local and sectional needs is complete vindication of the idea that localized decisions are the wisest and most practical decisions. Thus, again, we may reasonably expect more results from less money.

Third. I should expect these intimate home responsibilities to obviate many interesting but costly sociological experiments in the name of relief, which are all very well if and when we can afford them, but which have no legitimate place in the naked relief challenge itself at a moment when new taxes are inevitable unless reduced expenditures can close our fiscal gap. Thus, again, it is my contention that less money would go just as far.

Fourth. I should expect such a system largely to obviate inequities in the distribution of Federal relief funds as between the various States, because the Federal distribution would be in cash rather than in projects—and the former is far more susceptible of rule of thumb than is the latter. There would be infinitely less chance for the invidious comparisons with which this debate has been studded.

Fifth. I should expect such a system to be better policed against exploitation, whether political or economic or otherwise, because, on the one hand, the power of neighborhood opinion would become effectively critical under the impulse of restored responsibility, and, on the other hand, the larger consciousness of local contribution would make it less likely that any sort of exploitation would be quite so complacently condoned. Thus, again, less money could buy more relief.

An infinity of examples could sustain the fifth contention. I content myself with one, indicating how decentralization, in lesser units, achieves this claimed advantage. I quote an editorial from the Columbia (Ohio) Despatch of June 7:

> The rapid decline in the relief rolls in Ohio since the General Assembly turned them back to the local communities brings forcefully to the public mind the excessive waste under the former Federal-State administration, designed in no small part for political purposes.
> Not only has the relief load been reduced from 71,000 cases, representing treble that number of individuals, to about 41,000 cases in the short space of 3 months, but what is more enlightening, this drastic reduction has been made without injury or suffering being reported in any case.

One additional significant paragraph may be worth reading:

> As part of this reasonable, economic, and efficient handling of the problem, Auditor Ferguson has instructed local officials now in direct charge of relief to compel prospective clients to reregister, which alone has caused the drop of thousands and to attempt to get work before applying for aid to which the response on the part of those formerly on relief has been gratifying.

It is my contention that the experience thus reported from Ohio—an experience that has been repeated under kindred circumstances in many other sections of the land—demonstrates to what an extent, under a reversion to home responsibility and home obligation, there can be a cleansing of the illegitimate in respect to relief, and the full meeting of legitimate relief at lower expense.

Mr. President, I shall not extend the argument. I have said enough fully to indicate the philosophy of action which my substitute addresses. I only add, in conclusion, that the substitute proposes a total Federal relief appropriation of $1,250,000,000, of which $100,000,000 shall be held back for allocation to emergencies, on the theory that the lesser sum, under such methods of administration, can buy as much, if not more, actual relief than the $1,500,000,000 expended under the existing system, which the President establishes as the measure of our need for the next fiscal year. In other words, it is not proposed to economize at the expense of those legitimately deserving relief. It is proposed to economize in the method and the spirit and the efficiency of the scheme of distribution and administration.

Therefore, Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the joint resolution and to insert the matter which I send to the desk.

(Mr. VANDENBERG's amendment, in the nature of a substitute, is as follows:)

That to provide relief and work relief and to increase employment, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $1,250,000,000, which shall be available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938.

SEC. 2. (a) Not more than $1,150,000,000 of the sum appropriated by section 1 shall be available for grants-in-aid to States to assist them in financing and administering such forms of relief and work relief and methods of increasing employment as may be determined upon and undertaken by them. Such amount shall be allocated by the Federal Relief Board (hereinafter established), with the approval of the President, among the several States upon the basis of the Board's findings and conclusions with respect to the facts concerning and weight to be given to unemployment and living costs in, and population and financial resources of, the several States. Not more than 15 percent of such amount shall be paid to any State.

(b) The sum allocated to a State under subsection (a) shall be paid quarterly by order of the Federal Relief Board to the State if—

(1) The Governor (or in the case of the District of Columbia, the District Commissioners) has certified to the Federal Relief Board that there has been established a board of relief trustees in such State the membership of which is not composed solely of individuals who are members of the same political party, and that such board has the power and duty of receiving and disbursing sums which may be granted such State under this section;

(2) The State board has certified to the Federal Relief Board that the State, or its subdivisions, or both, have provided or are prepared to provide an amount equal to not less than 33⅓ percent of the amount allocated to it under this section for relief, work relief, or methods of increasing employment; and

(3) The State board has agreed to furnish to the Federal Relief Board such reports (respecting the administration of the relief, work relief, or methods of increasing employment with respect to which funds allocated to the State under this section are used) in such form and containing such information as the Federal Relief Board may from time to time require, and to comply with such provisions as the Federal Relief Board may from time to time find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports.

(c) If the Federal Relief Board finds that any part of an amount granted to a State under this section has been diverted to a purpose not reasonably within the purpose of furnishing relief, work relief, or increasing employment, or that more than 75 percent of the amount devoted to such purposes has been expended out of grants under this section, the amount of future grants to be made to the State shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount the Board determines has been diverted or the amount the Board determines to be such excess.

(d) The Federal Relief Board shall allocate, out of the sum specified in subsection (a), such sums as it deems necessary on the basis of the needs of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the Canal Zone for relief, work relief, and increasing employment. Such sums shall be expended as the Board prescribes as necessary for such purposes and subject to such requirement, if any, as the Board may prescribe for contribution by the possessions to such purposes.

SEC. 3. Not more than $100,000,000 of the sum appropriated by section 1 shall be available to enable the Federal Relief Board, with the approval of the President, in its discretion and on its order, to make such grants or loans to States as it deems necessary in order to meet extraordinary and unforeseen emergencies, and such grants or loans shall be made without regard to the provisions of section 2. The sum specified in this section shall also be available for all administrative expenses of the United States in carrying out the provisions of section 2 and this section.

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby established the Federal Relief Board, which shall be composed of three members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than two of the members of the Board shall be members of the same political party and the President shall designate one of the members as chairman. Each member shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum.

(b) The Board shall have the power and duty of carrying out sections 2 and 3 of this act, and such powers and duties shall be exercised under the direction and subject to the approval of the President.

(c) The Board is authorized to make such expenditures, and, subject to the civil-service laws and rules and regulations made thereunder and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, as may be necessary to carry out its powers and duties.

SEC. 5. Any person who knowingly makes any false statement in connection with securing a grant or loan or making any report or furnishing any information under section 2 or 3, or who solicits or receives political contributions from any person who directly or indirectly receives any part of a grant or loan made under section 2 or 3, or any person who, in administering any such grant or loan, discriminates against any person on account of race, religion, or political affiliation shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both. For the purposes of this section, each payment made by a State to which a grant or loan has been made under section 2 or 3 for relief, work relief, or increasing employment shall be considered to consist one-fourth of funds of the State and three-fourths of funds of the United States.

SEC. 6. There is hereby appropriated the sum of $10,000,000, which shall be available for carrying out during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, the provisions of written contracts made prior to the date of the enactment of this act under authority of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, or the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1936. Except the sums appropriated under this section, no part of the sums appropriated under this act shall be available for carrying out such acts. No contract shall be entered into under such act of 1935 or 1936 after the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 7. As used in this act the term "State" means the several States, Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. This act may be cited as the "Relief Appropriation Act of 1937."

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think I have a few moments left, and I am now very happy to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not care to interrupt the Senator at this time.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan, in connection with his argument, to discuss the facts which I presented here last week, to the effect that on direct relief handled by the States and the local communities, during the first 11 months of last year—I have the figures for the first 11 months totaled—a total of $494,000,000 was spent. Of that, $480,000,000 was spent in the first 11 months. Of that $484,000,000 spent on direct relief, only $401,000,000 went to the recipients of relief. Eighty-three million dollars was spent in administrative costs, or an administrative cost of 16 percent on direct relief handled by the States and communities, as compared with an administrative cost of 3.5 percent on Works Progress Administration projects handled by the Federal Government.

Further, I should like to have the Senator discuss the fact that direct relief handled by the States and local communities increased the number of persons on their rolls from 1,571,000 in June of 1936 to 1,725,000 in February of 1937, while at the same time W. P. A. rolls were being decreased.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I listened to the able Senator's presentation 2 or 3 days ago with a great deal of interest, and I found his figures very challenging. I made some inquiries respecting them. I am sorry I cannot respond conclusively. They are figures collected by Mr. Hopkins himself. Everything depends upon how books are kept.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It is true that the compilation of the figures was made by someone in W. P. A., but it was simply a compilation taken from the reports made by the various State and local agencies.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that; but, of course, everything depends on the basis on which the figures are assembled and mobilized. I understand, for instance, that practically all the standard social-service functions in these communities, which would be in operation anyway, are included in the figures. I have no right to say that dogmatically; I am told that those statistics are part of the figures. That simply illustrates what I am saying about the impossibility of knowing what the figures mean except as we have the complete break-down.

Regardless of what the disparity may be, however, it seems to me it cannot be gainsaid that the existence of a dual system, a duplicated system, Federal and State, is bound to involve duplicated overhead; and I distinctly recall the evidence which was submitted a year ago to the Committee on Appropriations from a section of New York City which demonstrated, it seemed to me, beyond peradventure at that time, that the Federal system was almost a complete and often needlessly duplicated system of administration. So that whatever the disparity may be, still there must be duplication, it seems to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Michigan has offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Chair understands is the same as Senate bill 2390. The substitute is, of course, open to amendment. At the same time the text of the joint resolution is open to amendment. If such amendments are presented, they will be treated as in the nature of perfecting amendments and acted upon first. If amendments are not offered at this time, then the action will come immediately upon the proposed substitute.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume the substitute will not be presented until the original text has been perfected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires, however, to present it now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. To be held for submission at the proper parliamentary moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the parliamentary rule the substitute may be offered now; and, having been offered, it may be perfected, if the Senate sees fit, by adopting amendments to it. On the other hand, the text of the joint resolution is open to amendment at the same time. The presentation of such amendments would not make the substitute out of order but would permit both the substitute and the text to be perfected. So that there is no reason why the Senator should not offer the substitute now if he sees fit to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Chair is unquestionably correct in the statement of the rule, but the Senator from Michigan does not desire to offer the substitute at this time. It may be offered later, after the joint resolution now before the Senate shall have been perfected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is always interesting and sometimes fascinating. I regret that on account of an enforced absence I missed much of the debate on the pending measure which occurred during the last few days. However, I was present yesterday and voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

I am as anxious as is any Senator in this Chamber that the necessity for Federal expenditures in behalf of unemployment and the Works Progress Administration shall decrease as rapidly as possible. After all, the objective of this legislation is to get rid of itself. The objective is to get men back into private employment as soon as possible. Therefore it is a sort of a suicide club within the organization, if properly administered.

What the Senator from Michigan proposes is, after we have conducted Federal relief measures and organizations over a considerable period, and as we are preparing to draw in the lines and reduce expenditures for such purposes, with the hope of demobilizing the organization, that we adopt a wholly new plan, abolish the Federal system and the Federal organization which is supposed to have learned something from experience during the past 3 or 4 years, and turn over Federal grants to the States, so that they may then establish new organizations, without experience in this particular line of work, or without much experience, and start all over.

I submit that that is not sound business. I marvel that a Senator from a great industrial State, which has grown rich and great on business organization and new theories of developing business organizations, should propose in the Senate the abandonment of what we have been doing with a large measure of success, and setting up an entirely new system of State administration.

I quite agree with the theory of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. I believe that if we can put a reasonable part of the relief burden on the local communities, we will thereby decrease the urge for getting unneeded appropriations, and we will impart to each project a local character and a local interest, through the contributions of the people's own tax money, which will give a good flavor to the whole administration. But a proposal to turn over a billion and a quarter dollars of Federal money to State political and other machines throughout the country, for their administration through untried organizations ought never to receive the approval of the Senate; and that is what the Senator's amendment would do.

The Senator says he wants a nonpartisan board. If there has ever been a nonpartisan board in history I have not seen it. Some of them may be called nonpartisan, but someone is going to predominate; one group is going to outvote the other group, and if this activity were put entirely under State administration, all the cheap politics in disbursing the Federal money that has been seen in America would result. I do not say that at present the administration of relief is without some political color or taint; of course not. We are in political life, and practically every one in this country is more or less in political life; but, so far as possible, we ought to keep the political angle out of this matter.

If the management of this activity is put into the hands of a local administrator in Michigan, for instance, or Texas, or anywhere else, we are going to see that Federal money is very easily spent, and we are going to find out that the "boys who vote right", and all that, are not going to be neglected. That may be the theory of the Senator from Michigan, but it is not the theory of the Senator from Texas.

If relief is a Federal responsibility, then the Federal Government ought to keep its hands on the purse strings, and see where the money goes. It is all right to talk about local responsibility and local contributions. We had them prior to 1933. I regret that the Federal Government ever had to enter the field of providing relief; but it entered that field because local responsibility had fallen down, and because local funds had been exhausted. It went into the business of providing relief because the marvelous things which, it is said, would be accomplished in case the amendment of the Senator from Michigan should be adopted failed to materialize; and the local people had to come to Washington with their hands out asking for Federal money. So long as it is Federal money, the Federal responsibility is on us, and we would be derelict in our duty if we should delegate to State authorities the right to squander and spend Federal money. If it is to be squandered, let us squander it, because then we will be the ones responsible; then we will be the ones the people can hold accountable. Let us not "pass the buck", as it were, to someone else, and say, "Well, we were kind of depending on local responsibility, and we turned the money over to them, and if they squandered it, it is their fault." We cannot shirk the responsibility. It is here on our desks.

There is always someone like the Senator from Michigan who thinks that, no matter what is being done, we ought to do it in some other way. If I remember, the Senator from Michigan did not vote for the last relief bill. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator vote for the first one?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator voted for the first two emergency relief measures, and voted against the $5,000,000 grab-bag bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator voted against the last relief bill, and it is therefore to be assumed that he is against the whole movement. When I am having a house built I want someone to build it who wants the house built. I do not want sabotage; I do not want someone aiding me in work who does not believe in it, who does not favor it, and does not want my plan to work.

So I am not going to be led off into the miasma of the swamp by the Senator from Michigan. His heart is not in the present plan of relief. He does not believe in it. He is against it. Why should he now ask the Senate to follow his plan of relief? He ought to vote against it all. I do not want a doctor fooling with me who does not believe in recovery. [Laughter.] I do not want a surgeon operating on me who believes in predestination and that nothing can be done about it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must not be any expressions of approval or disapproval or demonstrations of any sort in the galleries.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan complains about bureaucrats. I am just as strongly against the bureaucrats as is the Senator from Michigan, but my observation is that a bureaucrat is some official in a department who does not do what you want him to do [laughter]; and an official in a department who does do what you want him to do is a wonderful executive and a marvelous administrator.

Mr. President, we are all against bureaucrats. The present Congress and other Congresses have given to many bureaus power which I wish had never been conferred upon them; but who conferred the power upon them? They did not get their power anywhere but here. If there is in existence a bureau which can use power it is because Congress, the representatives of the people—and we speak of being the representatives of the people when we beat our breasts on picnic occasions—gave it to them. In the final analysis the power belongs, of course, to the people themselves. But we are their representatives here, and every little bureaucrat in the departments who is exercising authority can trace his title to that authority from the sovereignty of the Senate and the sovereignty of the House of Representaitves. That is where he got it. Let us not do what is proposed to be done by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. If bureaucrats have more power than they ought to have, let us take it away from them.

Yesterday I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to put on a little hobble and to slow down relief agencies, and to make the local communities contribute something toward their maintenance, but I am not going to be misled by the Senator from Michigan, who right in the middle of the creek wants to change the whole basis of the administration of relief, and put it in the States and their subdivisions. If the States and their subdivisions want to undertake relief and W. P. A. they have a perfect right to do it. The States are sovereign. If they have the money with which to do it, let them do it, but when they come to the Federal Government and ask the Federal Government to furnish the money they ought to be willing for the Federal Government to exercise some control not only over the expenditure of those funds but over the organization which disburses them. That is what we are trying to do. We have built up such an organization. Whether it is better than it used to be I do not know, but it ought to be better. It should have learned something in the last 3 or 4 years. Shall we dissipate whatever experience it has gained and now go out and recruit 48 separate State organizations from the boys over in ward 5 and some of them from ward 6, and put them on the local boards of administration, simply because they know how to get the boys to the ballot box on election day?

It is said that relief is not a national project. Perhaps it ought not to be, but it is. The Senator from Michigan comes from a great industrial State. He comes from a State which contains the city of Detroit, the great automobile center—the great, rich city.

Do Senators mean to say that the taxpayers of that city should not contribute anything in the way of income taxes to aid in the relief of a needy individual in South Carolina or in Colorado or in the State of Washington? Detroit does not live on the products coming from the soil within its city limits. It is not nourished only by the land of Michigan, but flowing into Detroit is the wealth that comes from the sweat and the blood of every man who runs an automobile, when probably he ought to be buying something to eat. However, everyone who runs an automobile pays his tribute into the coffers of those who live in Michigan.

I am not prepared to go back and tell that man, when he loses his job, when he is hungry, and when he is naked, that he must rely on a justice of the peace in precinct no. 8 in some poor little county to provide relief for him, and deny the Federal Government any power to reach up to the bloated billionaires and millionaires of Michigan and take back a little, in the form of taxation, of the inordinate profits they have extorted with high-pressure jacks from the little fellows all over the United States who are running their automobiles, and who with every pulsation of the old engine are adding a little more wealth to Michigan and to Detroit.

No, Mr. President; I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, to House Joint Resolution 361, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and I ask to speak on it briefly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 4, after the figures "$380,000,000", it is proposed to insert a comma and the following: "of which sum not more than $20,000,000 shall be allocated for a national census of population, employment, and unemployment to be taken at the earliest date, for the purpose of obtaining authentic information as to the number of persons in each of the several States and all subdivisions thereof who are employed and unemployed, classified by sex, age, customary occupation, and such other pertinent standards as may be advisable of all such employed and unemployed persons, and the causes and duration of such unemployment."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there can be no doubt that necessity demands a continuation of Federal relief. Unemployment is still with us, but the extent is still unknown.

It is fundamental that in order to improve and correct our relief system, making it more humane, more economical, and more just, we must have all the facts. Not estimates, not guesswork, not an average struck from the compilation of statistics gathered from varied official and unofficial sources—but information gathered thoroughly and completely from an official source.

It is obvious that neither in our private nor in our public affairs can we decide wisely without a knowledge of the facts. It is little short of astounding that in the United States of America we still do not know the facts on our most important single national problem—the problem of the man and woman who are willing and able to work but cannot find a job. We do not know how many of them there are, where they are, or what the nature of their unemployment is.

The result of this lack of knowledge is plain in every corner of the United States. We see waste of money in one place and lack of money in others. We see men and women who are trained for some particular line of work put to work on something entirely different, with misery to themselves and a wastage of their possible contribution to the community.

If I thought for even a single moment that this amendment which I am offering would jeopardize the employment of a single person in need of relief, I would be the last person to propose it. But it does no such thing. To the contrary, it provides that the person who cannot do manual labor but who is fitted for this type of work can be suitably employed in a real constructive job which will be of lasting benefit to the unemployed of this Nation. The elderly educated person no longer wanted in private employment, the young school and college graduate who finds no place for himself or herself in the business world, the clerk, the professional man and woman who cannot perform work that requires a strong muscular body, can once again find courage in the knowledge that here is work which justifies the drawing of pay and is a definite contribution to a major problem.

My proposal is in agreement with many of the authorities in governmental employ and others who are familiar with the national problem of unemployment and relief who desire a census.

Until we have the facts we can never deal with this problem, either in the interest of the taxpayer or in the interest of the unemployed man and woman. As long as we are in ignorance, this question will continue to frighten us and we shall be like ships lost in the fog. I say give light and we will find our way. Let us get the facts on this problem. We can then apply the magnificent resources of the United States to its solution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the announcement of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the address by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] excite me to make a statement at this time. I judge that probably I shall have no chance to register my vote on the proposal of the Senator from Michigan. Therefore, I wish to say that on a viva-voce vote or any other form of vote taken on that measure I shall support it by my vote. I shall do so because I seek, as I know all other Members of the Senate do, the great objective of economy, though I disagree with some of my colleagues with respect to what will effectuate economy, and I shall so vote also because I believe in decentralization of authority and the return of the control of a purely domestic affair to the several States.

With respect to economy, it has always appeared to me whenever a trustee or any other person is given a very large sum of money to expend upon the happening of an emergency or upon the happening of an event, that usually the emergency or the event happens and the money is expended. I believe that it is almost simple in its accuracy to state that if one desires to economize in the management and expenditure of other people's money he must do it, in part, by limiting the amount of the money to be devoted or appropriated to the use. Therefore, I think that the most simple step toward economy for us to take is one which reduces the total amount that may be expended for the purpose of relief. We differ about what is required; we differ about how much reduction can be made; but I believe that an appropriation limited to $1,000,000,000 would be huge enough to take care of the necessary relief.

As to changing the method of administering this fund, I favor a return to the several States of the administration of relief because I believe that the local administrator has infinite acquaintance with the people to whom relief is granted, knows their circumstances, and is less likely to be imposed upon than is an administrator here in Washington undertaking to administer relief all over this great continent.

It is, of course, possible that such administration of relief might be tainted with some politics, but let us not omit to consider what the special committee of the Senate found with respect to the administration of relief as it is now conducted. I think this matter has not as yet been called to the attention of the Senate and that it is worthy of consideration. The sixth recommendation of the committee, which will be found at page 137 of Report No. 151 of the investigation of campaign expenditures in 1936, reads as follows:

VI

It should be made unlawful for any person, corporation, group, organization, association, or for any officer, director, or agent of any corporation, or for any officer, director, or agent of any organization or association, unincorporated, or for any person holding a position, office, or employment, under or by the Government of the United States or any bureau, department, or agency thereof, to influence or attempt to influence through fear, intimidation, or coercion, the vote of any person employed by them, or of any person who is dependent on public funds, in connection with an election at which Presidential and Vice-Presidential electors, or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for.

Mr. President, that recommendation was founded upon the studies of the special committee, which I can testify were very impartially made. The committee, of course, was composed in such manner that a majority of its membership consisted of Democrats, and I testify that they viewed this whole problem, in my opinion, with great fairness, and studied the evidence with deliberation.

I will not take the time of the Senate to read, but I will epitomize what appears on page 19 of the report, and ask unanimous consent to have the portion which I have marked inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter may be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Literature to Civilian Conservation Corps camps: After the election the special committee received information regarding the mailing of literature to educational advisers of the Civilian Conservation Corps, relating to procedure for absentee voting, and decided to make inquiry to determine whether such literature, sent out by the Democratic National Committee in mimeograph form, operated improperly to influence members of the corps with respect to their voting franchise.

Two letters, in particular, were called to the committee's attention, and are set forth as follows:

The Democratic National Committee, through its secretary, on September 17, 1936, mailed to all camp educational advisers of the Civilian Conservation Corps camps a mimeographed letter of the following substance:

"MY DEAR SIR: In connection with our general circularization of bulletins to the absentee voters here in the District and throughout the various States, it has occurred to us that the bulletins giving information regarding the necessary requirements for the registration of a voter, the payment of poll tax (if necessary), and the qualifications of voters in the different States would be of interest to the enrollees in the Civilian Conservation Corps camps.

"Since you probably have a large number of absentee voters in your camp, as well as "first voters", we are attaching hereto for the general information of your department some printed bulletins which will answer the usual questions regarding qualifications of a voter, registration dates, and dates on which to apply for absentee ballots.

"If you consider this plan of any value as information bulletins we shall, of course, appreciate your posting same.

"Yours very truly,

"_____ _____."

On September 21, 1936, the Democratic National Committee sent a letter to Democratic city chairmen and to Democratic county chairmen in certain States and counties where Civilian Conservation Corps camps were located reading as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR: We note from our mailing list that you have in your county a Civilian Conservation Corps camp, and we are writing to suggest that you contact all the absentee voters from the various States in this camp. In order to assist in furnishing information on the various State voting laws, we are attaching an information sheet showing whether or not they can vote absentee.

"We feel sure from the experience we have had in the past that it will be more effective for you as local representative of your Democratic Party to contact these camps locally and urge the voters to make application in ample time to receive their absentee ballots from their respective official.

"If there is any information we can furnish from our bureau, please write us immediately and we shall be glad to assist you further in this connection.

"Sincerely yours,

"_____ _____."

There were attached to the letters above quoted four sheets of information showing in what States one could vote by mail, in what States absentee voting was not allowed, in what States voting was permitted by registered mail, and also information relating to States where registration was still possible by mail and otherwise before the Presidential election, together with instructions relating to registration and voting.

The secretary of the national committee, responding to inquiry by this committee, wrote in part:

"This information was posted as a bulletin in various Civilian Conservation Corps camps, making it available in a nonpartisan manner to any interested enrollees of the Civilian Conservation Corps of voting age. No attempt whatsoever was made to coerce the enrollees or force them to vote and the information contained in the bulletin was made available as mere factual data for those who might care to vote in the election by absentee ballot.

"Since it is more or less considered as a patriotic duty for every citizen of voting age to exercise his franchise as guaranteed him by the Constitution, I feel sure that our thoughtfulness in making this information available to the enrollees of the Civilian Conservation Corps camps, without any attempt to influence their decisions, ties in admirably with the educational programs being promoted by the Civilian Conservation Corps."

Mr. AUSTIN. Epitomized, it appeared to us that, among other political misuses of the unfortunate position of people on relief and of organizations and a vast amount of money that was in the hands of the Democratic administration in Washington, that the National Democratic Party reached into one of those organizations, the Civilian Conservation Corps, and made use of it politically in the following manner. I read from a letter, dated September 21, 1936, the letter having been sent by the Democratic National Committee to Democratic city chairmen and Democratic county chairman in certain States and counties where Civilian Conservation Corps camps were located. The letter reads as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: We note from our mailing list that you have in your county a Civilian Conservation Corps camp, and we are writing to suggest that you contact all the absentee voters from the various States in this camp. In order to assist in furnishing information on the various State voting laws we are attaching an information sheet showing whether or not they can vote absentee.

We feel sure, from the experience we have had in the past, that it will be more effective for you as local representative of your Democratic Party to contact these camps locally and urge the voters to make application in ample time to receive their absentee ballots from their respective official.

If there is any information we can furnish from our bureau, please write us immediately and we shall be glad to assist you further in this connection.

Sincerely yours.

Mr. President, I need not discuss that letter. There is not a Senator on the floor who does not fully understand its import, however artfully the letter was drawn. That and many other things, which I will not take the time of the Senate to refer to, caused this recommendation to be made by the committee.

A man must undress in the dark who lives in a glass house; it does not behoove a distinguished member of the Democratic Party to stand here and charge in advance that there may be some political use of the powers of an administrator in a State of this Union if the method of administration of relief were changed from the centralized form which we now have to a decentralized form in which the administrators will know the people with whom they are dealing and the circumstances in which they live and will know the need they have for help.

Mr. President, I have said perhaps more than I intended to say. The principal objective I have is to register myself not against relief, for I shall vote for the pending relief measure when the time comes to vote upon the main issue, but I am glad to have an opportunity to vote for the proposed substitute, and I record my position in this manner.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a word about the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The Senate a few days ago adopted a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the number of unemployed and all questions relating to unemployment. So it is certainly not necessary to order another investigation by a provision attached to the pending joint resolution to do exactly the same thing. The resolution to which I have referred was submitted, as I recall, by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and I am quite sure that resolution will bring out the facts and that it will be unnecessary to duplicate the work of the special committee by providing that another agency shall engage in a similar undertaking. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be voted down.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I should merely like to point out that according to the Bureau of the Census it would take between $17,000,000 and $20,000,000 to make a census of the unemployed. My amendment does not seek to appoint a committee to study the question of unemployment relief at all. I think that the committee of which the Senator speaks has a very useful function to fulfill, but with the small appropriation at the command of the special committee—which I think is $10,000, quoting the figure from memory—they cannot possibly undertake to make a census in the way the Bureau of the Census could make it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate resolution to which I have referred reads, in part, as follows:

> That a special committee consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the Vice President, is hereby authorized and directed to study, survey, and investigate the problems of unemployment and relief, including an estimate of the number of persons now unemployed by reason of the use of labor-saving devices, mechanical and otherwise, in operation in the United States, and obtaining all facts possible in relation thereto.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment.

In addition to that, the Senate has passed a joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] which covers the same objective as that suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. It seems to me that under the Senate resolution we will be more likely to get the facts.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. Then I will yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Tennessee says, the resolution authorizing the appointment of a senatorial committee provides for an "estimate" of unemployment, which is entirely different from a census. We have had hundreds of estimates.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all any report would be.

Mr. LODGE. Whereas the amendment submitted by me provides for a census. As I have said, the special committee has a useful function to fulfill, but an estimate by a senatorial committee having an appropriation of only $10,000 at its command is not the same thing as a census of unemployment conducted by the Bureau of the Census with an appropriation of $20,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I have some remarks I desire to make, and I will wait until the Senator from Tennessee concludes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have said about all I wanted to say. An investigation having already been provided for, I do not see the necessity for providing for another one by the pending joint resolution and earmarking the enormous sum of $20,000,000 for the work. I do not think the committee appointed under the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Montana will experience any difficulty in obtaining the information, and they will probably obtain it for a very much less sum. Therefore, I hope the Senate will vote down the pending amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. What is the present status of the resolution to which the Senator refers?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] is now about to take the floor, and, inasmuch as it is his resolution, I will let him answer the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I will answer first the question of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. He desires to know the present status of the Senate special committee. The committee has been appointed by the Vice President. After the appointment was made I submitted another resolution increasing the size of the committee by two members. That latter resolution was referred to the special committee and has not yet been reported by that committee. As yet no meetings of the committee have been held. I am quite sure they will begin work shortly. I think probably the consideration of the present relief bill has tended to delay the commencement of the work of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator the kind and extent of the work contemplated by the committee?

Mr. HATCH. I am going to comment a little upon that in connection with the pending amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I want to say first that I am in hearty accord with the idea of the Senator from Massachusetts and the assembling of the information he seeks to assemble through his amendment. I doubt the efficacy of the amendment. I doubt whether the amendment in its present form prescribes the definitions and other matters which are necessary to assemble the information which he wants.

The resolutions to which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has referred do not provide for a census of unemployed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The wording of my amendment is based on information which I received from Mr. Isador Lubin,

Commissioner of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor. In a letter to me dated March 22, 1937, he said:

> There is no doubt but that there is an essential need for authentic information on the number of persons unemployed in the United States at the present time.
> In order adequately to assess the extent of the unemployment problem it will be necessary not only to secure the number of unemployed but also the number who are employed and their relationship to the total population. Accordingly, I should like to recommend to you that the census, if taken, should be one of population, employment, and unemployment.

That is the language I followed in preparing my amendment. If the census cannot be taken by the Bureau of the Census under the terms of the language indicated by the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, then I do not see how a census of anything can ever be taken.

Mr. HATCH. I understand the position of the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to his amendment. As I have said, I am not at all in disagreement as to the desirability of obtaining all the information he seeks, and a great deal more besides. That was the purpose, I may say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in asking for the senatorial investigation, in order that the Congress for itself, through its committee, might study the entire problem of unemployment and relief, and assemble all the information possible not only from every agency of the Government engaged in work along such lines but from industry, from labor, and from every available source so that the Congress might legislate on the subject and lay down the program to be followed by the executive department.

Yesterday I voted against both of the amendments offered, the one by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the other by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but not because I was not in sympathy with reducing expenditures and economizing and with placing a proper share of the burden on the local subdivisions of government. All those objectives, I agree, are exceedingly desirable and certainly we all want to balance the Budget. But are we in a position at this time to write into this appropriation bill provisions which may fundamentally change the whole system of relief without first making a study and making the investigation to which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has referred in the resolutions which he mentioned.

I believe not, and that is the reason why I voted against the amendments yesterday. I believe they involved a proposal to place the cart before the horse. I believe that throughout the past years we have established a policy of appropriating sums of money and turning them over to the executive department and telling the executive to take care of the relief situation. Until we investigate and until we know that some other system is better, it is my belief that we must continue to follow the recommendations of the executive department.

I do not believe that should be our permanent policy. I believe that we must act, that it is our duty as legislators to examine into all the factors involved, including the problems recited the other day by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] in his address.

We talk about the national credit and the possible bankruptcy of our credit and the downfall of the Nation through inflationary methods. I do not see that prospect now, but unless we can so arrange our economic order that men who want to work can find the opportunity to work, I cannot say how long our experiment in democracy will last. That, I may say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], is another one of the reasons why I have urged a study and investigation of the entire problem of unemployment and relief.

To the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I will say that I should like very much to have his amendment referred to our committee, together with other resolutions and bills which have been introduced and are now pending before this body, in order that we may recommend some form of census of unemployed and employed, together with all the other elements necessary to give us real information.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator whether he is in favor of the adoption of the amendment at this time?

Mr. HATCH. I do not favor the adoption of the amendment at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator tell me why?

Mr. HATCH. As I have said, I want the committee now studying the question of unemployment not only to consider the thought set forth in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts but also the plan suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], whose resolution is pending before one of the committees of the Senate, together with other resolutions and bills looking toward doing exactly what the Senator from Massachusetts asks.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. MCNARY. I do not see the practicability of the Senator's proposal. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] wants to divert, from the sum of $380,000,000 appropriated for educational purposes, $20,000,000 to make the survey he suggests. It does not propose to take any more money out of the Treasury. It does not contemplate a new appropriation. It is a diversion of funds from one particular line to another, the two being similar in their nature.

The amendment could not properly be referred to the special committee. That committee can only hold meetings and consider matters for the purpose of framing legislation. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does not in any way contemplate the work to be done under the resolutions mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] a moment ago, but it does authorize a bureau of the Government to make a census of employment and unemployment, the cost of which has been estimated by the authority in charge of that work to be about $20,000,000. That is the basis for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and he has asked to divert only $20,000,000 for this specific purpose.

Therefore the attitude of the Senator from New Mexico is not, in my opinion, consistent. He favors the resolution and I favor the resolution to increase the personnel of the special committee, but that resolution has not as yet been reported to the Senate. That special committee has for its purpose the acquiring of data upon which we may base future legislation. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts simply proposes to take part of a sum already authorized to be appropriated and use it in making a census of employed and unemployed, a wholly unrelated duty to be performed. I think it is idle to have the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts referred to the special committee, because that committee could not do anything with it in any event.

Mr. HATCH. I am not saying that it ought to be referred to that committee, but I think one of the first objects of the committee should be to go into the question of a census of unemployed, to determine the kind, nature, and method of taking such a census. That is one of the studies to be made by the special committee.

Mr. MCNARY. I realize that. That is confirmatory of what I have said. The committee must go into that matter for the purpose of determining whether they shall recommend legislation of that kind.

Mr. HATCH. That is the purpose.

Mr. MCNARY. That is as far as the committee can go; but that is not what the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts contemplates. His amendment proposes to have a census made in the usual form by the Bureau of the Census, which has the power and the ability to do that work.

Mr. HATCH. And my point is that I object to the amendment being offered to the joint resolution at this time because of the many complications that present themselves in taking a census of the unemployed.

In that connection, without taking the time of the Senate unduly, I wish to read, just briefly, part of a letter from the chairman of the Central Statistical Board, Dr. Rice, which was published in the New York Times recently, pointing out some of the difficulties that a mere census would encounter and how inconclusive some of the facts assembled would be:

To begin with, unemployment is a subjective phenomenon. The mere lack of a job does not of itself make a person unemployed. If he lives on income from investments; if he is a student in college; a small farmer or a small tradesman on the road to bankruptcy, he is not, in the usual sense, unemployed. But if the retired investor seeks to get back into harness; if the student decides to supplement the family income; if the small farmer and tradesman give up the struggle, they become unemployed.

And many other instances are given here by Dr. Rice. He concludes with a discussion of the Johnson plan. General Johnson has proposed some sort of a plan for registration at noon by all the unemployed; and this is the conclusion of Dr. Rice's article:

The Nation needs such a census, but it would be much more than a census of unemployment. The time at which a special census of this kind could be taken profitably has now passed, and it has become a simple matter of good judgment to wait until the established decennial enumeration of 1940.

I am presenting this especially for the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts to show the differences of opinion regarding this matter. It may be that the census we would take now, and for which we would spend $20,000,000, would be out of date and would be really ineffectual in accomplishing the object the Senator desires to accomplish.

It is for that reason that I oppose the amendment at this time. Later on, after the committee shall have made a thorough study of those matters, I may support the identical amendment which the Senator today proposes; but, like the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], I believe that the Senate having authorized this investigation and study by the Senate committee, we should not now set aside $20,000,000 for a census of the unemployed.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD not only the letter by Dr. Rice but also the editorial of the New York Times which appears on the same page.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 15, 1937]

CENSUS OF THE UNEMPLOYED—STATISTICAL BOARD CHAIRMAN POINTS OUT DIFFICULTIES IN THE WAY To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The proposal to take a census of unemployment has become the "houn' dawg" of the New Deal. Few public issues have been so persistently "kicked aroun'," and few have been more consistently misunderstood by advocates and opponents alike. As Chairman of the Central Statistical Board, a Federal agency charged with the duty of planning and promoting the improvement, development and coordination of governmental statistical services, I believe it is timely to remove some of the misconceptions.

The term "census of unemployment" is a misnomer. It implies that the unemployed may be counted without reference to any other class of persons, just as children would be counted in a school census. Actually, such a count is feasible only in connection with a general census.

Beyond doubt there will be a census of unemployment as a part of the 1940 population census. To take a special census as early as it could now be provided for—in the spring of 1938—would be practicable only on the condition that the 1940 census be deferred at least 2 years. Only so could administrative and technical conflicts be avoided. But this would introduce important new issues. To comply with the Constitution, the special census would have to become the Sixteenth Decennial Census and be used as a basis for the next congressional reappointment. The "regular" census, if taken after 1940, would legally become a special census. It is doubtful whether general approval for such an arrangement could be secured.

A special census of population, to include data on employment status, would have been highly useful in 1935, 1936, or even in the spring of the present year. It was provided for by the Lozier bill, which passed the House of Representatives with administrative support in the Seventy-third Congress, but was crowded off the Senate calendar at the end of that session.

DIFFICULTIES TO BE MET

It may be useful to consider some of the difficulties that will be encountered if and when the unemployed are counted.

To begin with, unemployment is a subjective phenomenon. The mere lack of a job does not of itself make a person unemployed. If he lives on income from investments, if he is a student in college, a small farmer or a small tradesman on the road to bankruptcy, he is not, in the usual sense, unemployed. But if the retired investor seeks to get back into harness, if the student decides to supplement the family income, if the small farmer and tradesmen give up the struggle, they become unemployed.

Consider the case of an employed father, his wife in the home and his daughter in high school. He loses his job, the wife and daughter seek work. Can we say in this case that the number of unemployed has been increased by one or by three? One employee has been displaced, but the subjective effect is that three people start looking for jobs, to glut an already oversupplied labor market.

Similarly, many men and women who are "unemployable" because of age or physical or mental handicaps are nevertheless looking for work. Are they "unemployed"? As a matter of economic and psychological fact, employability is largely a matter of labor demand; and this is true, as well, of the "work shy", who appear to be avoiding employment.

Unemployment is not only subjective; it is also negative. It is a state of not doing something. Employment, by contrast, is positive. It is much easier to record and count the things people do, such as work, than to record and count what they do not do. Only by the most careful definition of the "universe", within which people might be doing something but actually are not, can we count the number of persons who are un-anything.

JOHNSON PLAN DISAPPROVED

The proposal to conduct a census through self-registration of the unemployed, as proposed by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, attempts to escape these difficulties by evading them. It asks each individual to answer for himself whether or not he is unemployed. No available inducements would bring about the self-registration of all genuinely unemployed persons. If jobs could be offered to all registrants, the appeal to register might be effective; but the implication that jobs or relief would be forthcoming would infinitely harass all concerned with the program.

On the other hand, many who were not genuinely unemployed would register. Many who are not actively in the labor market, as well as many who hope to secure better jobs, would place their names on the registration lists. The net result would defy analysis.

A positive national policy for the collection of information needed by government, business, and the public generally would include three requirements:

1. A complete census of population, occupations, employment, unemployment, and other data related thereto should be taken once in every 5 years.

2. This census should secure an account of the employment status of every potentially employed person. Data on unemployment is not enough. Employment is most usefully regarded as a variable, not as a fixed, condition. One may work overtime, full time, part time, occasionally, or not at all. Hence unemployment, instead of being the antithesis of employment, is one extreme on the scale of employment status. We are essentially interested, not in the lack of work per se, but in the human miseries and the social problems that such a lack brings forth. These are not confined to unemployment.

3. The census should be so tied to existing current data as to provide a base line or benchmark for the periodic revision and correction of the latter. If this tie-up were perfected, there would exist a satisfactory means of estimating the volume of employment and unemployment at frequent intervals. This would dispose of the oft-repeated argument that the results of a census would be out of date as soon as they were issued. Current data to which the census might be attached by statistical methods would include the employment and pay-roll figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the active files of applicants for jobs maintained by the United States Employment Service, and the industrial returns for covered establishments now being developed by the Social Security Board.

The Nation needs such a census, but it would be much more than a census of unemployment. The time at which a special census of this kind could be taken profitably has now passed, and it has become a simple matter of good judgment to wait until the established decennial enumeration of 1940.

STUART A. RICE,
Chairman, Central Statistical Board.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1937.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 15, 1937]

MEASURING "UNEMPLOYMENT"

We print on this page today an important and unusually interesting letter from Stuart A. Rice, chairman of the Central Statistical Board, regarding the question of an unemployment census. Dr. Rice points to the inherent difficulties of counting the "unemployed" at any time, and argues that, while a census would have been valuable in 1935, 1936, or even in the spring of the present year, the time has now passed when a special census could usefully be undertaken without conflicting with the regular census of 1940.

With Dr. Rice's insistence that unemployment is a negative and partly a "subjective" phenomenon the Times is in full agreement. It has frequently called attention to the difficulty of defining "unemployment" for census purposes, and has contended that a useful census would be primarily one of employment, which, however, in addition to determining how many persons were employed and in which industries, would also classify the unemployed in several groups according to the length of time they had been out of work, the length of time, if any, that they had been on relief, and their status in other respects. Such classifications might not yield any single group all of whom could confidently be called "unemployed", but it would certainly throw greatly needed light on the nature and extent of our unemployment and relief problem.

Whether it is now too late, as Dr. Rice contends, to undertake a census of employment and unemployment without serious conflict with the regular census of 1940 is for the officials of the Bureau of the Census and other statistical experts to determine. Their opinions on the point should be obtained promptly and made public. If it is really too late, then responsibility for failure to obtain an earlier census must rest with the administration. Dr. Rice speaks of a bill for the purpose which came to grief in the Seventy-third Congress. But that was in 1933 and 1934, and there have been many opportunities since to push such a bill. This newspaper has been editorially urging a census of employment since 1935.

If we must now wait until 1940 to determine how many employed and unemployed there are, what are we to say meanwhile of the various estimates that are still so confidently cited as if they were factual? Who are these 9,721,575 persons which the American Federation of Labor declared to be unemployed in February of this year? Who are the 8,914,000 persons said to be unemployed by the National Industrial Conference Board? What are we to say of assertions emanating from the W. P. A. that there will always be at least 4,000,000 unemployed in the United States, even at the peak of prosperity? Here is the head of the Federal Government's Central Statistical Board declaring that we could not be sure who the unemployed really were even after we had asked and counted them. And here is another Government agency, the W. P. A., which without a count seems willing to predict exactly how many unemployed there are going to be. There is a lack of coordination somewhere.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Senator think it would be helpful to the committee if they obtained the facts with relation to the subject they are going to study?

I desire to refer briefly to certain opinions which have been expressed by persons who are prominent in the administration.

The Secretary of Commerce, Daniel C. Roper, under date of March 9, 1937, said:

> It would seem essential to the proper solution of this national problem that specific information be gathered as to the causes of unemployment, experience of the unemployed, their occupational aptitude and availability for absorption in other phases of industry.

Harry L. Hopkins is quoted in the Washington Star of January 7 of this year as follows:

> One major obstacle in the path of meeting the problem of unemployment has been the absence of really adequate unemployment figures. I am convinced that we ought to find out about this by taking an unemployment census. The job must be done.

Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, is quoted as saying, on March 22, 1937:

> It seems to me desirable that comprehensive and accurate determination be made both of the number of unemployed and, so far as possible, of the reasons for their idleness. As you know, a start in this direction was made in the census of 1930; that survey was, however, not designed to be a comprehensive one and the figures assembled are far from complete. No other authoritative census has been made.

There are a great many other official statements from persons in official life; and I cannot get out of my head the idea that in the case of a committee that is going to study the question of unemployment relief and recommend improvements in the present system it would be useful to have the facts as the committee goes along.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I think we shall have to have the facts; but does the Senator from Massachusetts believe that the amendment which he offers outlines the manner and method of determining all these questions? Who is to decide what is an unemployed person, under the amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Such questions would be determined by the Bureau of the Census.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New Mexico on the amendment has expired.

Mr. HATCH. I will speak on the joint resolution, if I have any more time. And all these other complicated and conflicting questions will be decided by the Bureau of the Census?

Mr. LODGE. The amendment sets forth the general precept, the general end we have in mind. It is the result of conferences that I have had with Government authorities on the question. I do not believe we want to be too specific and bind the administrative branch too much in carrying out this precept.

Mr. HATCH. My idea is that the Congress itself should lay down the specifications and the definitions for whatever census is undertaken if that census is to afford much information to the Congress. Frankly, I do not now possess the information necessary to draft the definitions and specifications which I believe to be necessary. I think we would get only a general census under this amendment, spend $20,000,000, and it might not be of a great deal of worth to the Congress by the time they received it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. McNARY and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a session pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], which I transfer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HALE]. I understand that on this amendment he has a pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. If present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "yea." I am informed that the Senator from Texas would vote "nay."

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on important business, and further to announce that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. POPE. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BERRY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce the absence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] because of illness.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are absent on important public business.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—30

Austin	Davis	Johnson, Calif.	Steiwer
Bailey	Duffy	La Follette	Townsend

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on page 10 of the joint resolution, line 8, I move to strike out the word "No" and insert "So far as not inconsistent with efficient administration, no."

I have talked with Senators who have varying views of the matter, and the explanation of the amendment is that there appears to be some little conflict between the paragraphs immediately preceding and those immediately following the place where I have offered the amendment, and for that reason it is offered at this place.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is not that the language which was suggested by the Comptroller General?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; this is not the amendment to which the Senator refers. This is largely a clarifying amendment.

Mr. McNARY. It is not the one about which the Senator spoke to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I will offer that amendment in a moment and call the Senator's special attention to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer virtually the same amendment on page 11, line 20, after the word "Hereafter", to insert a comma and the words "so far as not inconsistent with efficient administration" and a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 12, after the word "preference", in line 7, I move to insert a comma and the words "as nearly as good administration will warrant" and a comma. That is substantially the same amendment as the others offered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have one other amendment to offer. On page 4, lines 9 and 10, I move to strike out the words "adequate provision has been made or is assured for financing" and to insert "the sponsor has made a written agreement to finance."

The reason for the amendment is that the General Accounting Office thinks these are the proper words to be employed. I have spoken to the chairman of the subcommittee in regard to the matter, and we think it best to take these words to conference and work out a proper provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment on page 3. I have consulted the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], and I think he will have no objection to the amendment. It merely clarifies the point which was brought out yesterday in the debate. Senators think the language of the joint resolution is sufficient as it is, but I have consulted the Accounting Office, and the officials of that Office suggested that the language I have suggested would be an improvement over the language now in the measure. It does not change the amount.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the word "thereof" and to insert "or for completion of flood-control projects already begun and for which other relief money has heretofore been allocated."

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry. Was the committee amendment at this place agreed to or did it go over? The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is to a committee amendment, I understand, which already has been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the situation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment on page 3, line 6, was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection. The Chair hears none; and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Texas, but I do not like to have the amendment inserted in this particular section of the bill. It seems to me it ought to go in the general list of projects which are appropriate for expenditure under the joint resolution. In this particular section we endeavor to place limitations upon the use of money.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, that is exactly why the Senator from Texas wants it done in this way. The Senator from Colorado suggests that the amendment be placed in the general flood-control provision, but the language on page 3 is a limitation on every project mentioned later on. I should like to have the Senator take the amendment to conference and work it out there. All I want is to be sure that the joint resolution covers the point.

Mr. ADAMS. The difficulty is that the implication of putting it in at this place is that it is not for relief or work relief.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not necessarily. I hope the Senator will exercise his usual graciousness and permit the amendment to go to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to this section before the amendment as amended is acted on.

Mr. President, this amendment had placed a limit upon the amount which may be expended for administrative purposes. It has been called to my attention that the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labor performs a very essential part of the relief work in certifying those who are available and who are qualified for employment for relief work. Therefore I move as an amendment to this proviso that in line 15, after the word "Commission", there be added as an additional exception "the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labor."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the amendment. Yesterday I offered a similar amendment with respect to the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce, but the amendment was left out on the understanding that it would be perfectly proper to put it into the joint resolution when it went to conference if there was a reason for it. I am just wondering if the Senator from Colorado would not let his proposed amendment take the same course. I favor his amendment. I think it should go in the joint resolution, but I should not like to have that course taken with regard to one amendment and not with the other.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the course suggested by the Senator from Tennessee is entirely agreeable to me. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] I know had another amendment having to do with the National Emergency Council. All three amendments can be handled together and worked out in conference. I think it would be much better to do it in that way.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not know that the Senator from Tennessee had suggested such an amendment. Yesterday my attention was called by the Bureau of Air Commerce to the fact that if that Bureau were not included in this exception it would be left out entirely.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offered an amendment with reference to that Bureau yesterday, and I think, as does the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], that it can be taken care of in conference.

Mr. BARKLEY. The same situation exists with respect to the National Emergency Council. Instead of leaving a large number of exceptions to be considered by the conference committee, inasmuch as exceptions have been made in the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, and the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee, and the one that I am now suggesting as to the National Emergency Council, I think they ought to be included with the exceptions now provided in the measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to whatever course is taken with respect to them. I think all three will probably be put into the joint resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to point out to the Senators interested in including other agencies in the exceptions that, in my opinion, unless they are included in this amendment it will not be within the power of the conference committee to add them. This is a Senate amendment, and the only opportunity the conference will have to deal with the proposals will be through the Senate excepting some of these departments, and having the House accept the amendments. If they are to be considered in conference I think they should be incorporated in the amendment before it is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there can be no objection to that. I will ask the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] to include in his amendment the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce and the organization referred to by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. There should be included in the proposal of the Senator from Colorado the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce and the National Emergency Council.

Mr. ADAMS. I will accept those two and ask that they be added to my proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, as modified, to the committee amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 15, after the word "Commission", it is proposed to insert "the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labor, the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce, the National Emergency Council."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to be proposed to the committee amendment which has just been amended, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any other amendments to be offered?

Mr. BILBO. I offer an amendment in section 6, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 6, on page 10, in line 22, after the word "who", it is proposed to add the words "holds or"; and in the same section, in line 25, after the word "salary", it is proposed to add "or per diem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIDGES. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, in line 2, it is proposed to strike out "$1,500,000,000" and insert "$1,000,000,000."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of talk in the last few months, and particularly in the last few days, about economy, both by the administration and by different Members of both branches of Congress. I have no idea that the amendment which I offer will be agreed to. However, I should like to give the Senate an opportunity of voting either for or against a legitimate reduction in this relief appropriation on the basis that this is the one spot where a substantial reduction in Federal expenditures may be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 9, line 14, after the word "Administration", it is proposed to insert "The Administrator of the Works Progress Administration shall upon request make available to representatives of the public the names, positions, and salaries of all administrative personnel heretofore or hereafter appointed by the Works Progress Administration, or any subdivision or adjunct thereof, whose annual compensation is $1,000 or more."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, for the last 18 months I have been endeavoring in every possible way consistent with my office to persuade Mr. Hopkins to make available to authorized representatives of the public and to the newspapers the names, addresses, and positions of all the administrative personnel of the W. P. A. whose salaries are $100 a month or more. I have repeatedly written to Mr. Hopkins on this point. I have addressed a communication to him through the Secretary of the Senate, but my petition has consistently been disregarded.

When pressed for an explanation, Mr. Hopkins has said that I seek to make political capital out of the use of these names. Therefore he justifies himself in withholding them. Irrespective of the motive which he attributes to me, I ask if such an answer would be acceptable if made by any State, county, or municipal administrator of public affairs? Would it be possible for a governor, a mayor, or a county commissioner to carry the names of their appointees on the public pay roll without permitting the taxpayers to know who were being employed and for what purpose? Obviously not, and I see no reason why the information which concerns the Federal Government should be withheld, unless it be that Mr. Hopkins fears the investigation of appointments which such listing would bring.

I wish to make it clear, as I have always done in the past, that I am not asking for the names of those who are receiving relief or the small-salaried person on work relief. I have no desire to bring unwanted publicity to the average person on relief. I do, however, maintain that the names and positions of all persons on W. P. A. who exercise administrative authority, whether it be large or small, and who have an opportunity to exert political influence because of the jobs they hold, be made available to the public immediately.

I have consistently asked for this information, and I have asked for it many times. Mr. Hopkins indicated last year during the election campaign that I had asked for it as a campaign publicity measure. The fact is that I had often asked for it long before the November election, and I have continued to ask for it ever since. By withholding this essential information, Mr. Hopkins has placed himself in the light of desiring it kept as a permanent campaign issue, for I expect to continue to ask for it until some adequate explanation be given why these names are kept from the public. Not only that, Mr. President, but I have tried time and again to get the names of the political appointees in Pennsylvania, and I have been unable to get them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see no objection whatsoever to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and, if he is willing and other Senators are willing, I see no reason in the world why it should not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, referring to page 18, I am advised that the House of Representatives had an estimate of the amount of money necessary to take care of the projects already promised in the sum of $340,000,000. The Senator from Arizona in drafting this amendment divided the item and eliminated $40,000,000 and made one item $200,000,000 and the other item $100,000,000. In order to take care of the projects that have been approved or tentatively approved, as I understand, it may require more than $300,000,000; and inasmuch as the joint resolution is to go to conference, I shall offer an amendment to increase the appropriation to the amount suggested by the House of Representatives in the total sum of $340,000,000. The matter could be adjusted then in conference so as to take care of such projects as have been approved and contemplated in this act.

I submit an amendment increasing the figure in line 4 on page 18 to $220,000,000, and likewise the figures in line 5, on page 18, from $100,000,000 to $120,000,000. That will make it necessary to increase two items on page 19 in line 21, namely, the item of $58,000,000 should be increased to $70,000,000, and the appropriation of $7,000,000 should be increased to $22,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator is seeking to amend a committee amendment, which has been agreed to. Therefore, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I submit this amendment for the conferees to consider, and, if necessary, to adjust.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Do these items increase the total sum above a billion a half dollars?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment comes in title II relating to the P. W. A. It does not refer to the billion-and-a-half-dollar appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I gather from his remarks that the Senator from Oklahoma is proposing the amendment by reason of some commitments made in the House. At the same time it does not seem to me that we are necessarily obligated to abide by the commitments that have been made in the House. These matters have been considered by the Senate Appropriations Committee, and it is my understanding that the amounts recommended by the committee were satisfactory to the Public Works Administration and would cover the items which would seem to be necessary. Of course, there are various projects in various sections of the country which could be constructed with $340,000,000, but which could not be constructed with $300,000,000. The same argument would apply if the amount were raised to $400,000,000. It is just a question whether or not the Senate wants to spend $40,000,000 more. It is true the amendment would go to conference, but I think, as a practical matter, the House having voted for $340,000,000 in an independent measure, if we go to conference with a $340,000,000 item there is not much doubt that the outcome of the conference will be a $340,000,000 appropriation; and I am very reluctant to see the amount increased.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the amounts provided in the joint resolution are adequate to cover all commitments that the committee reported to the Senate. By adopting an amendment yesterday at the instance of the Senator from Oklahoma—and I have no objection to his amendment—we have increased somewhat the class of projects which are recognized as moral obligations, and, in order to follow out the committee's policy of providing sufficient funds to meet all moral commitments the increases now suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma are necessary. I hope the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] will not object to carrying this amendment to conference. I am sure that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] recognizes that this amendment is needed.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, there is a distinction between what the House of Representatives and the Senate propose to do with respect to these amounts. As I read the House bill (H. R. 7363) it would increase to $340,000,000 the amount that might be used for grants by the Public Works Administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was in a separate bill, and the increase would not be binding on the conferees. They would have the power to fix the appropriation at any amount between that they wished. Is not that true?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; but the next question, of course, is what is a moral obligation? As the Senator from Oklahoma stated in connection with his proposal yesterday, the reason why the project in his State could not qualify under class (b) in the committee amendment is that under this Oklahoma situation the State legislature has created an authority that could issue bonds without an election; that they had submitted a project; that it had the approval of the three divisions of the Public Works Administration and was in every manner qualified, except that no bond election was required. For that reason the Senator from Oklahoma thought that the project ought not to be considered among the other moral obligations. Whether the House will agree when the joint resolution goes to conference that the sum total of money made available should be the same remains to be determined. I think the Senator in charge of the measure will find that the House proposition for $340,000,000 is not a combination of grants and loans but relates to grants only and includes sums heretofore allocated to grants for projects now under construction.

Mr. ADAMS. I suggest to the Senator from Arizona that if we go to conference with a $340,000,000 appropriation, all the House will do will be to say, "We concur in the Senate amendment." In other words, there is not much opportunity for us to debate it; they will merely agree to the increase in the appropriation made by the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation, though, in the conference will be that, the House joint resolution containing no provision whatever on this subject, and the Senate measure providing $300,000,000, the only ground for a conference will be somewhere between nothing and $300,000,000. The conferees could not go above three hundred million. If we put in $340,000,000 now they could reduce it, but without the amendment they could not go beyond $300,000,000. Therefore the amendment ought to go in now, so that the $40,000,000 will be in conference.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is a correct statement of the parliamentary situation, but I want to make clear to the Senate that $340,000,000 as listed by the House does not mean $340,000,000 in the same way as provided in title II of this joint resolution. When this joint resolution goes to conference there will be arguments with the House conferees as to what are moral obligations. The moral obligations set out by the Senate are not exactly the same moral obligations that were contemplated by the House. If the House desires to go as far, and only so far, as was stated to the House by the majority leader and by those in charge of the joint resolution in the course of the debate on the measure that has passed the House, the ultimate amount for both loans and grants may be less than $340,000,000. I am satisfied of that, because there is not the latitude in the House joint resolution that there now is in the pending joint resolution with respect to the use of money from the revolving fund of the Public Works Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there is some question in the minds of many as to whether or not the funds made available in the pending measure will be open to our Indian citizens or Indian wards. In order to make that matter clear I tender an amendment. On page 5, line 8, after the word "persons", I suggest an amendment by inserting two words "including Indians." Then there can be no question that the funds appropriated will be available for Indians in the event the President sees fit to make allocations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the amendment in the nature of a substitute presented by me early in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may be authorized to renumber the sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, consent is granted.

If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6692, being the War Department appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6692) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, after line 6, to insert the following:

Title I—Military activities and other expenses of the War Department incident thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Military activities—Contingencies of the Army", on page 7, line 17, after the word "proper", to insert a comma and "and his determination thereon shall be final and conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Government", so as to read:

For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators, and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices in the District of Columbia, or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, and for examination of estimates of appropriations and of military activities in the field, to be expended on the approval or authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, and his determination thereon shall be final and conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Government, $17,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am obliged to leave the Chamber for a few moments. Would the Senator object to considering the amendment on page 53 at this time? I have a telegram from Gen. George A. White, a prominent officer of the National Guard in my State, to the effect that the proviso found on page 53 is unsatisfactory to the National Guard. The amendment provides for the extension of the camp at Fort Sill, Okla. Can the Senator from New York advise me as to that?

Mr. COPELAND. In answering the Senator from Oregon I can answer several other Senators who have asked about the matter.

Mr. McNARY. Would the Senator rather take it up later?

Mr. COPELAND. No; I shall be very glad to do so now.

The House exceeded the Budget estimate by $1,468,310 in one item. The Department had been given very liberal appropriations all along the line, and then the House succeeded in going beyond the estimate by that amount. We were not willing to do this because we desired to keep the amount of the bill under the Budget estimate, but we found that we could go half way with the House, so we decided to strike from the bill $734,000 which had been appropriated in excess of the Budget estimate. With that in reserve we had appeals made to us by the War Department and others to take care of the Fort Sill project, and so that was added and the necessary amount taken out of the sum saved, as I have suggested.

The National Guard is not going to suffer. There will be the same number of members as contemplated, but the sums of money which were distributed all through the bill in the House for construction and maintenance at camps, for gas and oil, correspondence courses, articles of uniform, ammunition, band music, and various other items, enabled us to make this reduction in order that the Budget estimate might be preserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Finance Department—Pay, etc., of the Army", on page 10, line 15, after the word "thousand", to strike out "one hundred and seventy-five" and insert "six hundred and fifty-three"; in line 16, after the word "officers" and comma, to strike out "$34,329,995" and insert "$34,843,745"; in line 19, after the word "exceed", to strike out "five" and insert "thirty-six"; in line 20, after the word "officers" and the comma, to strike out "$2,270,900" and insert "$2,398,304"; on page 11, line 2, after the word "Scouts" and the comma, to strike out "$67,042,594" and insert "$67,798,594"; in line 8, after the word "exceed", to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve"; in line 9, after the word "duty" and the comma, to strike out "$14,234" and insert "$14,831"; in line 18, after the word "available" and the comma, to strike out "$6,343,960" and insert "$6,418,349"; in line 19, after the word "allowances" and the comma, to strike out "$6,150,421" and insert "$6,221,925"; and on page 12, line 2, after the words "in all" and the comma, to strike out "$161,548,460" and insert "$163,092,107", so as to read:

For pay of not to exceed an average of 12,653 commissioned officers, $34,843,745; pay of officers, National Guard, $100; pay of warrant officers, $1,371,836; aviation increase to commissioned and warrant officers of the Army, including not to exceed 36 medical officers, $2,398,304, none of which shall be available for increased pay for making aerial flights by nonflying officers at a rate in excess of $1,440 per annum, which shall be the legal maximum rate as to such nonflying officers; additional pay to officers for length of service, $9,610,595; pay of an average of 165,000 enlisted men of the line and staff, not including the Philippine Scouts, $67,798,594; pay of enlisted men of National Guard, $100; aviation increase to enlisted men of the Army, $574,798; pay of enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts, $1,050,447; additional pay for length of service to enlisted men, $5,170,468; pay of the officers on the retired list, $12,999,525; increased pay to not to exceed 12 retired officers on active duty, $14,831; pay of retired enlisted men, $13,521,730; pay not to exceed 60 civil-service messengers at not to exceed $1,200 each at headquarters of the several Territorial departments, corps areas, Army and corps headquarters, Territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, service schools, camps, and ports of embarkation and debarkation, $72,000; pay and allowances of contract surgeons, $46,320; pay of nurses, $933,340; rental allowances, including allowances for quarters for enlisted men on duty where public quarters are not available, $6,418,349; subsistence allowances, $6,221,925; interest on soldiers' deposits, $45,000; payment of exchange by officers serving in foreign countries, and when specially authorized by the Secretary of War, by officers disbursing funds pertaining to the War Department, when serving in Alaska, and all foreign money received shall be charged to and paid out by disbursing officers of the Army at the legal valuation fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, $100; in all, $163,092,107; and the money herein appropriated for "Pay of the Army" shall be accounted for as one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 17, after the word "Academy", to insert "or to Filipinos in the Army Transport Service", so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That no part of this or any other appropriation contained in this act shall be available for the pay of any person, civil or military, not a citizen of the United States, unless in the employ of the Government or in a pay status under appropriations carried in this act on July 1, 1937, nor for the pay of any such person beyond the period of enlistment or termination of employment, but nothing herein shall be construed as applying to instructors of foreign languages at the Military Academy, or to Filipinos in the Army Transport Service, or to persons employed outside of the continental limits of the United States except enlisted men of the Regular Army, other than Philippine Scouts, upon expiration of enlistment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Travel of the Army", on page 15, line 1, before the word "which", to change the appropriation for travel allowances and travel in kind, as authorized by law, for persons traveling in connection with the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department from $2,250,000 to $2,486,150.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster Corps", on page 19, line 6, after the words "in all" and the comma, to strike out "$29,329,150" and insert "$29,601,900", so as to read:

Subsistence of the Army: Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue as rations to troops, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, civil employees when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, general prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), Indians employed by the Army as guides and scouts, and general prisoners at posts; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and offices at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; for the subsistence of the masters, officers, crews, and employees of the vessels of the Army Transport Service; meals for recruiting parties and applicants for enlistment while under observation; for sales to officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army. For payments: Of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, and to enlisted men when stationed at places where rations in kind cannot be economically issued, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty. For payment of the regulation allowance of commutation in lieu of rations for enlisted men, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, civilian employees who are entitled to subsistence at public expense, and general prisoners while sick in hospitals, to be paid to the surgeon in charge; advertising; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of War for enlisted men of the Army who graduate from the Army schools for bakers and cooks, the total amount of such prizes at the various schools not to exceed $900 per annum; and for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, testing, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army; in all $29,601,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 8, after the word "reasons" and the comma, to strike out "$11,851,320" and insert "$11,901,320", so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 15, after the word "less", to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That laundry charges, other than for service now rendered without charge, shall be so adjusted that earnings in conjunction with the value placed upon service rendered without charge shall aggregate an amount at least equal to the cost of maintaining and operating laundries and dry-cleaning plants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 4, after the word "to", to strike out "$819,520" and insert "$829,520", so as to read:

Army transportation: For transportation of Army supplies; of authorized baggage, including packing and crating; of horse equipment; and of funds for the Army; for transportation on Army vessels, notwithstanding the provisions of other law, of privately owned automobiles of Regular Army personnel upon change of station; for the purchase or construction, not to exceed $282,700, alteration, operation, and repair of boats and other vessels: Provided, That the amount authorized for the purchase or construction of vessels in the appropriation for "Army transportation", contained in the War Department Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1937, is hereby increased from $786,000 to $829,520; for wharfage, tolls, and ferriage; for drayage and cartage; for the purchase, manufacture (including both material and labor), maintenance, hire, and repair of pack saddles and harness; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official military and garrison purposes; for hire of draft and pack animals; for travel allowances to officers of National Guard on discharge from Federal service as prescribed in the act of March 2, 1901 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 751), and to enlisted men of National Guard on discharge from Federal service, as prescribed in amendatory act of September 22, 1922 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 752), and to members of the National Guard who have been mustered into Federal service and discharged on account of physical disability; in all, $12,580,000, of which amount not exceeding $250,000 for the procurement and transportation of fuel for the service of the fiscal year 1938, and not exceeding $1,000,000 for the procurement of motor vehicles, shall be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Military posts", on page 27, line 1, after the word "For", to insert "work authorized by the act of June 4, 1936 (49 Stat. 1462), at Edgewood Arsenal, Md., $854,000; for work authorized by the act approved May 6, 1937, at Fort Niagara, N. Y., $54,000; for work authorized by the act approved May 14, 1937, at Camp Stanley, Tex., $578,050, and at Savanna Ordnance Depot, Savanna, Ill., $861,190; for"; in line 14, after the name "Virginia", to strike out "$338,000" and insert "$258,000"; and in line 15, after the words "in all", to strike out "$8,756,000" and insert "$11,023,240", so as to read:

For construction and installation of buildings, flying fields, and appurtenances thereto, including interior facilities, fixed equipment, necessary services, roads, connections to water, sewer, gas, and electric mains, purchase and installation of telephone and radio equipment, and similar improvements, and procurement of transportation incident thereto, without reference to sections 1136 and 3734, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1339; title 40, sec. 267); general overhead expenses of transportation, engineering, supplies, inspection and supervision, and such services as may be necessary in the office of the Quartermaster General; and the engagement by contract or otherwise without regard to section 3709, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), and at such rates of compensation as the Secretary of War may determine, of the services of architects or firms or corporations thereof and other technical and professional personnel as may be necessary; to remain available until expended and to be applied as follows: For work authorized by the act of June 4, 1936 (49 Stat. 1462), at Edgewood Arsenal, Md., $854,000; for work authorized by the act approved May 6, 1937, at Fort Niagara, N. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Acquisition of land", on page 27, after line 16, to strike out "For the acquistion of land, as authorized by the act of August 12, 1935 (49 Stat. 610): Vicinity of Mitchel Field, N. Y., 342 acres, more or less, to be used exclusively for runways and to cost not to exceed $1,520,000, $750,000" and insert "For the acquisition of land, as authorized by the act of August 12, 1935 (49 Stat. 610): Vicinity of Mitchel Field, N. Y., 342 acres, more or less, $500,000: Provided, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of War may acquire by condemnation or may enter into contracts for the acquisition of the above land in the vicinity of Mitchel Field to an additional amount not in excess of $1,020,000, and his action in so doing in either case shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment thereof"; and on page 28, line 19, after the words "in all" and the comma, to strike out "$1,202,000" and insert "$952,000", so as to read:

For the acquisition of land, as authorized by the act of August 12, 1935 (49 Stat. 610): Vicinity of Mitchel Field, N. Y., 342 acres, more or less, $500,000: Provided, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of War may acquire by condemnation or may enter into contracts for the acquisition of the above land in the vicinity of Mitchel Field to an additional amount not in excess of $1,020,000, and his action in so doing in either case shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment thereof; vicinity of Kelly Field, Tex., $2,000; vicinity of Tacoma, Wash., to be available immediately, $60,000; and for the acquisition of all privately owned land and rights within the boundaries of the area in San Bernardino and Kern Counties, Calif., reserved and set aside for the use of the War Department as a bombing and gunnery range by Executive Order No. 6588, dated February 6, 1934, and, in addition, all privately owned land and rights within an area of approximately 59,163 acres of land adjacent to the tract described in such Executive order, located in San Bernardino, Kern, and Los Angeles Counties, Calif., $390,000; in all, $952,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 20, to strike out:

For the acquisition of land in the vicinity of West Point, N. Y., as authorized by the act approved March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1491), $150,000, and such sum, in conjunction with the appropriation of $431,000 for a like purpose, contained in the War Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937, without regard to the proviso attached to such former appropriation, shall be available solely for the acquisition of the tracts of land designated as priorities 1 to 9, both inclusive, on the map on file in the office of the Quartermaster General, designated as "Map 'C', tract locator", and dated June 22, 1936.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For the acquisition of land in the vicinity of West Point, N. Y., as authorized by the act approved March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1491), $431,000, and such sum, in conjunction with the appropriation of $431,000 for a like purpose contained in the War Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937 without regard to the proviso attached to such former appropriation, shall be available until expended: Provided, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of War may acquire by condemnation or may enter into contracts for the acquisition of land in the vicinity of West Point to an additional amount not in excess of $638,000, and his action in so doing in either case shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment thereof: Provided further, That no land shall be acquired east of the west boundary of the Highway 9–W, or east of the west boundary of the Highway 9–W as it may be relocated by the State of New York prior to the acquisition of this land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Signal Corps—Signal Service of the Army", on page 35, line 8, after the word "required" and the comma, to change the appropriation for "Telegraph and telephone systems: Purchase, equipment, operation, and repair of military telegraph, telephone, radio, cable, and signaling systems, etc.", from $5,702,920 to $5,894,520.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Air Corps—Air Corps, Army", on page 38, line 5, after the name "Secretary of War" and the comma, to strike out "$60,500,000" and insert "$57,745,300", so as to read:

For creating, maintaining, and operating at established flying schools and balloon schools courses of instruction for officers, students, and enlisted men, including cost of equipment and supplies necessary for instruction, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, machines, textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, instruments, and materials for theoretical and practical instruction; for maintenance, repair, storage, and operation of airships, war balloons, and other aerial machines, including instruments, materials, gas plants, hangars, and repair shops, and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith and the establishment of landing and take-off runways; for purchase of supplies for securing, developing, printing, and reproducing photographs in connection with aerial photography; improvement, equipment, maintenance, and operation of plants for testing and experimental work, and procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, gas, and sewerage, including maintenance, operation, and repair of such utilities at such plants; for the procurement of helium gas; for travel of officers of the Air Corps by air in connection with the administration of this appropriation, including the transportation of new aircraft from factory to first destination; salaries and wages of civilian employees as may be necessary; transportation of materials in connection with consolidation of Air Corps activities; experimental investigations and purchase and development of new types of airplanes, autogyros, and balloons, accessories thereto, and aviation engines, including plans, drawings, and specifications thereof, and the purchase of letters patent, applications for letters patent, and licenses under letters patent and applications for letters patent; for the purchase, manufacture, and construction of airplanes and balloons, including instruments and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction (airplanes and balloons), or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; for the marking of military airways where the purchase of land is not involved; for the purchase, manufacture, and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes; for all necessary expenses connected with the sale or disposal of surplus or obsolete aeronautical equipment, and the rental of buildings, and other facilities for the handling or storage of such equipment; for the services of not more than four consulting engineers at experimental stations of the Air Corps as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, at rates of pay to be fixed by him not to exceed $50 a day for not exceeding 50 days each and necessary traveling expenses; purchase of special apparatus and appliances, repairs, and replacements of same used in connection with special scientific medical research in the Air Corps; for maintenance and operation of such Air Corps printing plants outside of the District of Columbia as may be authorized in accordance with law; for publications, station libraries, special furniture, supplies and equipment for offices, shops, and laboratories; for special services, including the salvaging of wrecked aircraft; for settlement of claims (not exceeding $250 each) for damage to persons and private property resulting from the operation of aircraft at home and abroad when each claim is substantiated by a survey report of a board of officers appointed by the commanding officer of the nearest aviation post and approved by the Chief of Air Corps and the Secretary of War, $57,745,300, of which $10,669,786 shall be available under the appropriation "Air Corps, Army, 1937", for payments under contracts for the procurement of new airplanes and of equipment, spare parts, and accessories for airplanes, as authorized by said appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 18, after the word "of", to strike out "$17,245,300" and insert "$20,000,000", so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That in addition to the amounts herein appropriated the Chief of the Air Corps, when authorized by the Secretary of War, may enter into contracts prior to July 1, 1938, for the procurement of new airplanes and for the procurement of equipment, spare parts, and accessories for airplanes to an amount not in excess of $20,000,000, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Ordnance Department—Ordnance service and supplies, Army", on page 43, line 23, after the figures "$22,137,000" and the comma, to strike out "and, in adidtion, $144,000 of the appropriation 'Ordnance service and supplies, Army, 1937', which is hereby reappropriated", and on page 44, line 1, after the word "available", to strike out "$288,000" and insert "$144,000", so as to read:

For manufacture, procurement, storage, and issue, including research, planning, design, development, inspection, test, alteration, maintenance, repair, and handling of ordnance material, together with the machinery, supplies, and services necessary thereto; for supplies and services in connection with the general work of the Ordnance Department, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, advertising, stationery, typewriting and computing machines, including their exchange, and furniture, tools, and instruments of service; to provide for training and other incidental expenses of the ordnance service; for instruction purposes, other than tuition; for the purchase, completely equipped, of trucks, and for maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn freight and passenger-carrying vehicles; for ammunition for military salutes at Government establishments and institutions to which the issues of arms for salutes are authorized; for services, material, tools, and appliances for operation of the testing machines and chemical laboratory in connection therewith; for the development and procurement of gages, dies, jigs, and other special aids and appliances, including specifications and detailed drawings, to carry out the purpose of section 123 of the National Defense Act, as amended (U. S. C., title 50, sec. 78); for publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office, including subscriptions to periodicals; for services of not more than four consulting engineers, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, at rates of pay to be fixed by him not to exceed $50 per day for not exceeding 50 days each, and for their necessary traveling expenses, $22,137,000, and of the total sum hereby made available $144,000 shall be available exclusively for equipping 75-millimeter guns with high-speed adapters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 12, after the word "chemical", to strike out "warfare", so as to make the subhead read:

Chemical Service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Seacoast defenses", on page 47, line 16, after the name "United States" and the comma, to strike out "$2,443,410, of which not less than $200,000 shall be applied to the procurement of mobile antiaircraft guns and mounts" and insert "$2,243,410"; in line 19, after the word "departments" and the comma, to strike out "$1,092,710" and insert "$992,710"; in line 20, after the word "than", to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$200,000"; in line 22, after the word "Canal" and the comma, to strike out "$1,467,200" and insert "$1,367,200"; in line 23, after the word "than", to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$200,000"; and in line 25, after the words "In all" and the comma, to strike out "$5,003,320" and insert "$4,603,320", so as to read:

For all expenses incident to the preparation of plans and the construction, purchase, installation, equipment, maintenance, repair, and operation of fortifications and other works of defense, and their accessories, including personal services, ammunition storage, maintenance of channels to submarine-mine wharves, purchase of lands and rights-of-way as authorized by law, and experimental, test, and development work, as follows:

United States, $2,243,410;

Insular departments, $992,710, of which not less than $200,000 shall be applied to the procurement of mobile antiaircraft guns and mounts;

Panama Canal, $1,367,200, of which not less than $200,000 shall be applied to the procurement of mobile antiaircraft guns and mounts;

In all, $4,603,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we have just stricken out the word "warfare" in line 12, page 44. I ask unanimous consent that the word "warfare" be stricken out wherever it appears in the bill in the phrase "chemical-warfare service", so it will read "chemical service" instead of "chemical-warfare service."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, since interruption of the consideration of amendments has been permitted by the able Senator from New York in charge of the bill, I seek at this time to obtain information from him, first by informing him that I had a similar protest in the nature of an inquiry from members of the National Guard of my State of Illinois as that referred to by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. It appears that the appropriation necessary for their welfare has been limited to a degree which they feel is harmful.

I have replied that there is nothing in the measure which prevents the application for some future relief, should such become necessary, either from the War Department direct or through a special measure before this honorable body in what may be called a deficiency bill.

I ask the able Senator from New York, who is in charge of the bill, if such statement is correct and may be relied upon as one upon which they can likewise rely?

Mr. COPELAND. The statement of the Senator from Illinois is entirely correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to have permission to bring to the attention of the able Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], in charge of the bill, several communications I have had in the form of letters and telegrams.

I have before me a telegram from R. C. McClelland, of Wilmington, N. C., reading as follows:

WILMINGTON, N. C., June 21, 1937.

Hon. R. R. REYNOLDS:

War Department appropriation bill unsatisfactory to States and urge your assistance as follows: Restore amount to House figures in line 1, page 53; strike out entire proviso reference construction camp at Fort Sill, four-hundred-odd-thousand dollars in line 17, page 53; restore item to House figures in line 5, page 67.

R. S. McCLELLAND.

In addition to that I have a telegram from J. Van B. Metts, president of the Adjutant Generals' Association, sent to me from Raleigh, N. C., and reading as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., June 18, 1937.

Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
United States Senate:

War Department appropriation bill unsatisfactory to States and urge your assistance as follows: Restore amount to House figures in line 1, page 53; strike out entire proviso reference construction camp at Fort Sill, four-hundred-odd-thousand dollars in line 17, page 53; restore item to House figures in line 5, page 67. All other States will be penalized to provide this construction of benefit only to Oklahoma.

J. VAN B. METTS,
President the Adjutant Generals' Association.

I also have a telegram from Don E. Scott, brigadier general of the National Guard of North Carolina, at Graham, in that State, reading as follows:

GRAHAM, N. C., June 21, 1937.

Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
Senate Chamber:

War Department appropriation bill unsatisfactory to State and urge your assistance as follows: Restore amount to House figures in line 1, page 53; strike out entire proviso reference construction camp at Fort Sill, four hundred-odd thousand dollars in line 17, page 53; restore item to House figures in line 5, page 67. All other States will be penalized to provide this construction of benefit to Oklahoma.

DON E. SCOTT,
Brigadier General, N. C. N. G.

I wanted to bring these telegrams to the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill and ask if there is not some way he can suggest that we can make restoration of the amount originally appropriated for the benefit of the National Guard.

Not only are the National Guard men of North Carolina interested in the item, but it is my understanding, from the information I have derived from other Members of this body, that the National Guard men of other States are equally interested.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Gladly.

Mr. WHITE. May I say at that point that I have had similar protests from the adjutant general of Maine with respect to this action of the committee? The complaint is substantially the same as that made by the Senator from North Carolina. I join with him in the expression that there will be some satisfactory explanation of the amendment made by the committee, and I express also the hope that something may be done to preserve the interests of the National Guard.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator from Maine very much for his contribution. I am confident that if the Senator from New York in charge of the bill will make inquiry, he will find a great number of the Members of this body have received similar complaints.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WALSH. Apparently every Member of the Senate has received from members of the National Guard of his State telegrams similar to the ones presented by the Senator from North Carolina. In order that we may properly inform the adjutants general of our States, I think it is quite essential that an explanation should be made of the reduction in the amount in line 1, page 53, the amendment in the middle of page 53, and the amendment on page 67. The complaint about the amendment on page 53 seems to be based not on opposition to the expenditure in Oklahoma, but on opposition to the amount being taken out of the regular National Guard funds. The telegram which my colleague and I have received protest against the funds of the National Guard being used for the construction work which is proposed by the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this amendment was incorporated in the bill at my request, as I happened in part to represent Oklahoma, and the Fort Sill Reservation is immediately adjacent to my home. The request came to me from the adjutant general of my State, General Barrett, and I presented the request, and the committee kindly accepted it.

In the event that this fund is to be taken from the fund that serves the National Guard of the Nation, and in the event it is disclosed that this appropriation will diminish the funds available for such purpose, I shall not urge it. In that event I shall be glad to withdraw it. If the Senate shall see fit to let this amendment go into the bill and into conference, if the National Guard authorities object to it, it will be entirely agreeable to me to have it withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the position taken by the Senator from Oklahoma is an exceedingly fair one. In view of his statement, I think the amendment should be adopted. Nothing could be fairer than the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, not only has each Senator had a telegram from his National Guard unit but I have had telegrams from every National Guard unit in the United States. Knowing the source of the telegrams, I did not reply to them all, but I talked by telephone with the man who facilitated these expressions, General Reckord, of Baltimore, and he now understands the situation.

Mr. WALSH. He is referred to in my telegram as one who is interested in and leading the movement.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me tell Senators the explanation. I had already explained it for the benefit of the Senator from Oregon, but I wish to have all Senators understand it. There is no relationship whatever between the Fort Sill project and this reduction, except that we use $400,000 of the reduction to pay for the Fort Sill project. If we had not taken it in that way, we would have taken it elsewhere; but that is the reason why we made the reduction.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to ask the Senator how it can be said, then, that the Fort Sill appropriation is not affected by or does not come out of the appropriation intended for the National Guard of the country?

Mr. COPELAND. If we had made no appropriation for Fort Sill, we still would have reduced the item $734,000. Let me tell the Senator why.

After the National Guard had received very generous treatment in the bill about armory drills and increased equipment and everything they wanted, they succeeded in the House in adding $1,468,000 above the Budget estimate. They had everything that the Budget Bureau had given them; the Budget Bureau had been very generous; but the House added $1,468,000. The Senate committee decided that it could not go along with the House to the extent of going above the Budget estimate for the National Guard nearly a million and a half dollars, so we decided that we would reduce the amount; we would cut it in two in the middle, and we would go along and give them half of it.

Senators all know how bills are made up. Having made that cut, and being desirous of building the Fort Sill camp—which, by the way, is helpful to the National Guard—we took some of the money that we saved there to build the Fort Sill camp. If the Fort Sill camp should be taken out, the National Guard would not get any more money. Do Senators see what I mean? They would be just where they are now.

Mr. WALSH. So it is apparent that those who communicated with the various Senators did not know all the facts.

Mr. COPELAND. They did not.

Mr. WALSH. They assumed that the cost of the Oklahoma camp project was deductible from the total appropriation for the National Guard, and that is not the fact.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I may say that I cannot subscribe to the statement that there is no relation between the cut in the National Guard appropriation as allowed by the House and the $625,000 added for Fort Sill, because the Senator from New York has just stated that "we all know how bills are made up", and that having slashed this amount from the appropriation for the National Guard the committee proceeded to give it to Oklahoma. If the Senator from Massachusetts can say that there is no relation between the two, it is all right so far as he is concerned; but I do not want that to stand as my understanding of what happened.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know the method of making up bills in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COPELAND. Suppose we put it in another way. It would have been more tactful if we had just cut $734,000 off this item, and then had put Fort Sill in some other part of the bill where provision is made for construction. That could have been done, and then there would not have been a flood of telegrams relative to Fort Sill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will yield further, may I inquire, is it not also a fact that the cut in the National Guard item is one of the reasons why the committee felt that it could add $625,000 for some work at Fort Sill?

Mr. COPELAND. That is one reason.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it not the primary reason? The committee would not have liked to come in here with a bill adding $625,000 to the appropriations contained in the House bill, would it?

Mr. COPELAND. We came in here determined to have a bill under the Budget estimate, and we succeeded in doing so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Therefore, insofar as the members of the committee were very desirous of adding $625,000 for Fort Sill, it put under a lot of pressure any items that were lying around which the committee felt could be cut. I have always noticed that the committee feels that it can slash the National Guard with a little more immunity than it can slash items of the regular service. I, therefore, still contend that it cannot be said that there is no connection or relation between these two items, and I still believe that there is something to be said in behalf of the protests which have come up from the adjutant generals all over the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I do not care how devoted he is to the National Guard; I am more devoted, or certainly as devoted. There is not any arm of the service which makes such a strong appeal to me as that, perhaps, unless it is the R. O. T. C. I would rather spend money for the National Guard and the R. O. T. C. than to spend it anywhere else; and I know just as well as I know anything that when the bill goes back to the House they will insist upon this appropriation, and we will put it back.

But there is another reason why some money can be taken from the National Guard. They have something that no other arm of the service has; they have 100-percent interchangeability in their appropriations. If they do not spend money for equipment here, they can spend it for uniforms there. There is not any other branch where that can be done.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not a fact that whatever may have been the purpose, however it was done, the practical effect is that something was taken away by the Appropriations Committee from the National Guard of North Carolina and Massachusetts and Maine and other States?

Mr. COPELAND. And New York—$50,000 from New York.

Mr. WHITE. And New York; and a portion of that which was taken away from us was given to the Fort Sill project. In other words, we lost and Fort Sill will have the money.

Mr. COPELAND. The Fort Sill project would have been in the bill anyway; and, of course, if I had to do it over again, I would put it in at a different place.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from New York if the amount of money allotted to the National Guard in the Senate bill is more than or equal to the sum allowed by the Budget Bureau?

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes; it is equal to it, and is far in excess of last year's appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. The House increased the Budget allowance?

Mr. COPELAND. It went a million and a half dollars beyond it.

Mr. WALSH. The Senate committee removed a portion of that increase—half of it?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. And, in addition to the amount allowed in the Budget, the Senate committee provided an appropriation for Fort Sill, Okla.?

Mr. COPELAND. Because there are other savings in the bill beside the one here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, was the appropriation which was made for Fort Sill included in the Budget estimate?

Mr. COPELAND. I am not sure that it was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Arms, uniforms, equipment, etc., for field service, National Guard", on page 52, line 20, after the word "trucks" and the comma, to insert "motorcycles,", so as to read:

To procure by purchase or manufacture, and issue from time to time to the National Guard, upon requisition of the Governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general, National Guard of the District of Columbia, such military equipment and stores of all kinds and reserve supply thereof as are necessary to arm, uniform, and equip for field service the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, including animals, motortrucks, motorcycles, field ambulances, and station wagons and to repair such of the aforementioned articles of equipage and military stores as are or may become damaged when, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, such repair may be determined to be an economical measure and as necessary for their proper preservation and use, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 1, to strike out "$12,360,591" and to insert "$12,032,229", so as to read:

ARMS, UNIFORMS, EQUIPMENT, ETC., FOR FIELD SERVICE, NATIONAL GUARD

To procure by purchase or manufacture and issue from time to time to the National Guard, upon requisition of the Governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general, National Guard of the District of Columbia, such military equipment and stores of all kinds, and reserve supply thereof as are necessary to arm, uniform, and equip for field service the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, including animals, motortrucks, motorcycles, field ambulances, and station wagons and to repair such of the aforementioned articles of equipage and military stores as are may become damaged when, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, such repair may be determined to be an economical measure and as necessary for their proper preservation and use $12,032,229, of which $500,000 shall be available exclusively for defraying the cost of increasing the strength of the National Guard from approximately 200,000 to not exceeding an average of 205,000 officers and men, and all of the sums appropriated in this act on account of the National Guard, except the subappropriation of $8,952,290 for expenses, camps of instruction, etc., and the subappropriation of $14,194,000 for pay of National Guard (armory drills), shall be accounted for as one fund, and of the total of all sums appropriated in this act on account of the National Guard, $1,500,000 shall be available immediately.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no interest in this matter so far as the amendment reported by the committee, beginning on line 12, which provides $625,000 for some construction work at Fort Sill, Okla., is concerned, but I think it is very clear from the discussion that went on prior to the time we reached this committee amendment on line 1, page 53, which cuts the National Guard appropriation from $12,360,591 to $12,032,229, that one of the reasons why the committee cut this National Guard item was that it desired to provide an additional sum of money to complete the construction work at Fort Sill, Okla.

It seems to me that no argument can be made in favor of the committee reducing the total for the National Guard on the ground that the House exceeded the Budget estimate when it has just been stated by the Senator from New York, in charge of the bill, that the item of $625,000 for the construction work at Fort Sill, Okla., was not estimated for by the Budget Bureau. Therefore, so far as these two items are concerned in relation to Budget estimates, they stand on exactly the same footing.

As I stated a moment ago, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the item providing $625,000 for Fort Sill, Okla., but I believe that the Senate should reject the committee amendment reducing the National Guard's appropriation, and I hope that we may have a record vote on that amendment before it is disposed of.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator know whether or not in this reduction the amount for the National Rifle Association matches, in which the National Guard and the Army engage, was reduced?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I understand, that is a separate item. What the committee did was to reduce the total, on the theory that the National Guard has the privilege of interchangeability of appropriations, and that, therefore, all they had to do was to reduce the total. What I am contending for is that we should separate the two items, and pass on each one on its merits, and not in relation to the other. I fear that that policy was not followed by the committee, and I hope the committee amendment on line 1, page 53, will be rejected.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. POPE. I desire to ask the Senator whether he knows why the item in line 1 at the top of page 53 has been reduced by the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from New York stated that the reason why the committee reduced the item for the National Guard was that the House had gone above the Budget estimates for the National Guard.

Mr. POPE. Was it reduced to the Budget estimate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; they cut it in two. My contention is that the two amendments should not be considered in conjunction with each other, that each ought to stand on its own merits. I hope the Senate will reject the committee amendment in line 1, page 53.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, before action is taken on this amendment I think a short explanation is in order.

Fort Sill is a Regular Army establishment. It is the site of the school of fire for small artillery. On this reservation, which covers a large area, there is a National Guard camp. The National Guard camp is the residue of old Camp Donovan, which was established there during wartimes, and the National Guird which assembles on this reservation is using to a large extent Federal equipment.

Fort Sill is headquarters for the Forty-fifth National Guard area, embracing Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Missouri, and, I think, Arkansas. The National Guard of these several States are sent to Fort Sill to train, and frequently the National Guard from two or three States are there at the same time.

It is the desire of the Army board representing all these States to have this camp improved. At the present time the tents have no floors excepting old wooden floors, and the item before us is to complete some concrete floors for the tents used when the guard is in camp in the summertime, and for the construction of some mess halls. The amendment specifies what the money is to be used for.

An Army board was assembled to consider this matter, and it went on record as favoring the improvements. Then the project was approved by the War Department. Colonel Chaffee was before the committee and recommended that this item be included in the bill. Of course, he did not state that of his own motion, but upon inquiry he made the statement.

The item was not in the Budget estimate, it is true; but the Department is for it, and with the understanding we had when the committee met that it would do no substantial injustice to any other State, the committee saw fit to include this item in the bill because it had been recommended by the War Department.

As I suggested a moment ago, if this money was to come from other States, I would not stand upon the floor and ask that money be taken from outside our area in order to make improvements in my State, and if it should be disclosed in the conference that the money will come from other States' allocations or quotas, I would ask the conferees on behalf of the Senate to withdraw the item from the bill entirely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The only way by which those of us who do not desire to have the National Guard provide this money for Fort Sill can make sure that it will come out of some other item is to reject the committee amendment on line 1, page 53, and adopt the House provision. Then when the conference committee come to produce the $625,000 for the improvement at Fort Sill, it will not take it out of the National Guard.

If the Senator will yield further, let me say that I am not opposing his amendment. All I want to make sure of is that if we reject the committee amendment in line 1, page 53, the conferees will not take the $625,000 out of the appropriation which the House granted the National Guard. So far as improvements are concerned there are many other States in the Union which are in need of construction work at their National Guard encampment posts. If we reject the committee amendment, the committee can find the $625,000 for Fort Sill somewhere else.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have received a number of communications on this subject, as have other Senators. I should like to ask the Senator from New York what the effect of the reduction in line 1, page 53, would be on the National Guard, and whether I am correct in my understanding that the reason for the reduction is that the House figure was above the Budget estimate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the National Guard was given an appropriation far in excess of last year's appropriation. Besides that, the Senate committee recommended them $734,000 more than the Budget estimate. If this bill shall be passed in its present form, the National Guard will have more than it had last year; it will have all that the Budget Bureau estimates for this year, and, besides that, it will have $734,000. That is pretty generous treatment.

I admit that we would have been more tactful if we had put the provision for Fort Sill somewhere else in the bill, but I wish to speak about Fort Sill in order to show its justification in connection with the National Guard appropriation.

The concurrent camp at Fort Sill is a semipermanent plant, which accommodates the summer training of C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., Organized Reserves, and the National Guard. The investment there now is $427,490, which has been gradually built up from C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and Organized Reserve funds, the National Guard bearing very little of the cost.

The extension described in this amendment involves $405,638, instead of $625,000. The Senator from Wisconsin was talking about the privilege of transfer, but he will find at the end of the item that the amount is $405,638. As I have said, very little of the money for the building up of the camp at Fort Sill has come from the National Guard. The extension which is provided for in the amendment before us is to build mess halls, concrete tent floors in the camp, camp headquarters building, assembly buildings, canteen buildings, and regimental infirmary, together with roads, trackage, and grading sufficient to allow an entire division of the National Guard troops to be accommodated there each summer for a period of training.

Since the existing camp is large enough for the purpose of training organizations other than the National Guard, it is proper that the National Guard appropriation should bear the cost of the extension. The point I make there is that the camp is now large enough.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is now arguing, as one of the reasons for the reduction in this item, that the National Guard should bear the expense of the extension.

Mr. COPELAND. No, no, Mr. President. If the Senator from Wisconsin will just be patient, and not get the idea that I am seeking to frustrate the desires of the Senate and particularly the desires of the Senator from Wisconsin, he will be happier, and so will I. I am simply trying to convey to the Senate what we saw in the committee.

Mr. President, in one sense the present arrangement at Camp Sill is sufficient for the C. M. T. C. and the R. O. T. C.; but since the camp is to be made large enough for an entire division of the National Guard in that section of the country, it certainly should bear the cost of the extension. The National Guard division which trains in this camp is composed primarily of Texas and Oklahoma troops. The amount allowed is based on an estimate by Regular Army and National Guard officers, and has been reduced by the War Department to absolutely essential items.

I think the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], when he presented this matter, asked for nearly a half million dollars, as I recall; but the Army engineers went over the estimate and found that $405,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then there was a provision for a swimming pool, and a hostess house, and some other items.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. I presume, from what has been said, that there is no objection to the Fort Sill item; but it is for the Senate to determine whether it desires to go twice as far as the committee went in the appropriation for the National Guard in this respect.

Bear in mind, now, that for the National Guard there is provided all that the Budget Bureau estimated, and then we have given it in this bill $734,000 above the estimate. We have the testimony of the Army that the appropriation which is proposed will not cause the reduction by a single man of those in training in the National Guard. The proposal applies simply to a miscellaneous lot of items such as band music, gas, and oil, and that sort of thing to the extent of $1,468,000; and, as I said, we thought in the subcommittee and in the full committee that we were very liberal if we gave them half that amount in excess of the estimate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, this reduction, as I understand, in view of the Senator's explanation, has nothing to do with the rifle training of the National Guard?

Mr. COPELAND. No; it has not.

Mr. TYDINGS. While I am on my feet, and in order not to punctuate debate further, may I ask the Senator, then, why on page 67 the appropriation was cut from $700,000 to $645,726?

Mr. COPELAND. It was cut $54,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why was that?

Mr. COPELAND. The rifle matches which will be eliminated by that reduction do not affect the National Guard or the R. O. T. C. The ones affected are the members of Schutzenbunds and shooting clubs, and white-haired men like myself who like to go there and shoot.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the national rifle matches be disturbed?

Mr. COPELAND. They will not be disturbed in the least.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator certain that no National Guard activities of that kind will be eliminated?

Mr. COPELAND. Absolutely.

Mr. TYDINGS. This is only to eliminate private rifle shooting?

Mr. COPELAND. This is only to eliminate private rifle shooting and giving free ammunition to men who like to practice shooting.

Mr. TYDINGS. It applies only to private individuals?

Mr. COPELAND. It applies only to private individuals. It has nothing whatever to do with the Army.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then the rifle training for the National Guard and the Reserve organizations will continue to be just as thorough?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; just the same.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. On that point, I do not wish to divert the discussion from the matter to which the Senator from Wisconsin has called attention, but since the question of the national rifle matches has been injected into the debate, does not the Senator know that when facilities are afforded a member of the National Guard who devotes himself to the Guard, and gives up time on Saturday afternoon and Sunday to train himself in rifle practice, with the possibility that he may some day be on one of the teams participating in a national rifle match, such facilities provide the very greatest and cheapest incentives which have ever been devised in this country toward the improvement of musketry in the National Guard?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand from what the Senator from New York told me at his desk several days ago, and which he has just reiterated on the flood, none of those activities of the National Guard will be impaired at all.

Mr. COPELAND. Not a particle.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, under the appropriation herein provided they can practice on Saturdays and receive free ammunition with which to develop their skill, and if they are sufficiently proficient they can participate in the national rifle matches.

Mr. COPELAND. We have made a very generous appropriation, an appropriation of $645,000, to take care of the rifle practice for the National Guard and the R. O. T. C., and it also provides for the national rifle matches. The reduction merely cuts out the old fellows.

Mr. TYDINGS. The reason I mentioned this matter, I may say to the Senator from New York, is that, as he probably knows, the impression has gone abroad that the opportunity for rifle training which the National Guard has expected in connection with the rifle matches has been denied because of this reduction in the appropriation. I do not want to have any question about it. I doubt very much that the Senate would want to maintain the National Guard in part and not permit it to have rifle practice, because we then would have many soldiers, but they would have no training in shooting.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me answer the Senator again. This provision does not eliminate any of the regular work. The Budget estimates which were reduced would have provided additional gratuitous ammunition for the members of civilian rifle clubs. The provision does not affect in any way the Organized Reserve or the National Guard.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am in thorough accord with what has just been stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in reference to this appropriation. I am desirous of seeing the appropriation left as it originally was, at $12,360,591. But, as the Members of the Senate will note, in line 1, page 53, the committee saw fit to reduce that amount to $12,032,229. I desire to have the first amount restored, because I do not want the present members of the National Guard, or those who may be inclined later to become members of the National Guard, to become discouraged.

I think the National Guard is one arm of our national defense service which unquestionably should be given as much consideration as is given to the members of the Regular Army by way of providing them with substantial and pleasurable conveniences. In using the words "pleasurable conveniences" I wish to mention the fact that a moment ago my friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] stated that as a result of the appropriation to be provided by this bill, amongst other improvements there would be a swimming pool, and likewise a hostess house would be constructed. I recognize the fact that there is nothing more enjoyable during hot weather than a plunge in a swimming pool, and I likewise recognize the fact that the erection of a hostess house at Fort Sill would be indeed a very attractive addition. At the same time, Mr. President, we must take care of our National Guard units.

As I stated a moment ago when I brought this matter to the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is in charge of the bill, I not only received a communication by telegraph from the adjutant general of my State but I likewise received other telegrams from those who were interested in the subject. After having brought the subject to the attention of the Senator from New York I was very happy to learn that most of my colleagues received similar telegrams, and as a consequence they are as much interested in this matter as I am, because they recognize that we must give due attention and consideration to the members of the National Guard. We must do that because we are all interested at the present time in national defense. We all know that we should interest ourselves in national defense, for the reason that the whole world is preparing for war, and one of these days we shall be involved in war. That date will not come until after there have passed to the Great Beyond all the mothers who lost sons beyond the seas; but regardless of what the sentiment is now, and regardless of what any of us may say, there will come a time when we shall be involved in another war.

The best way to keep out of war, as all Senators will agree, is to be prepared for war; and in the preparation for war we must consider our National Guard. To our National Guard must be given as much consideration as we give to the Regular Army, for this reason: Of the 2,000,000,000 persons constituting the population of the earth's surface today, there are 55,000,000 men in uniform and under arms; and with the 55,000,000 men in uniform and under arms and ready for war and in preparation for war, I am ashamed to say that the Regular Army of our country, which is the richest and the most prosperous on earth, stands nineteenth in the list of the armies of the world.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator be willing to make the comparison on the basis of expenditures? We certainly do not rank nineteenth on the basis of expenditures.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; we do not.

Mr. CLARK. No country in the world squanders more money in preparation for war than does the United States, as is demonstrated by this bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator might very well point out, in connection with his argument, that maintenance of the National Guard is the most economical kind of defense which we can have, because the National Guard is not constantly either on the pay roll or constantly in training. The training of the National Guard is very limited, and if we had no National Guard we would have to have a standing army much larger than we now have, as we would have no partially prepared force to fill the gap in case of emergency.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator from Maryland very much for his contribution; and in connection therewith I recall the contribution made a moment ago by the Senator from Missouri in reference to rifle-range practice. In pursuance of the subject in which we are all interested, I wish to repeat that, from the standpoint of the number of men under arms, we stand nineteenth in relation to the armies of all the other countries of the earth. It is my recollection on that point that Russia today has more men in uniform and under arms than has any other nation in the world, despite the fact that Russia has a population of only 178,000,000 it has more than a million men in uniform and under arms.

Returning to the question of appropriations, it is my recollection that last year the seven Soviet states comprising the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of Russia made what was the largest peacetime appropriation for war preparation that had ever theretofore been made, an expenditure in the sum of $3,000,000,000.

In further pursuance of the question as to the amount of money expended and appropriated by the various governments of the earth, it is my recollection that Great Britain now has under advisement an appropriation of $7,000,000,000 to be expended over a period and duration of 5 years.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator from North Carolina was referring to the nations that are best prepared, and suggested that the best method of keeping out of war is preparedness for war. History hardly bears out that statement. If we go back to the time of the World War, we find that the nations best prepared were the ones which got into that war first.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In that connection, I should like to say to the Senator that if on April 6, 1917, we had been properly prepared for war the occasion never would have arisen for us to have declared war or to have sent our men to Europe, where we lost 50,334 men and had 250,000 injured in battle. As a further result of our entry into the World War, in addition to the lives lost and the men who were wounded, it is going to cost us a hundred billion dollars before we get through paying for that war. That sum may seem a little large, but the Senator from North Dakota, who was here when President Coolidge, who was a very conservative man, was at the head of the Government, said—the statement may have been made after he had retired from the office of President of the United States—that before we got through the World War would cost us $100,000,000,000. I believe the records will reveal that up to date the World War has cost us about $53,000,000,000 of the $100,000,000,000 that we may count on paying.

Mr. FRAZIER. And we are not yet through paying.

Mr. DAVIS. We have not as yet begun to pay.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; we have not as yet begun to pay. I believe in being well prepared, for I believe that if we are well prepared nobody is going to attack us. To bring that down to the personal standpoint, in other words, I know if Jack Dempsey or Braddock were out here in the corridor I would not pick a fight with either one of them. I would be as nice and pleasant to them as I could be.

Mr. FRAZIER. There are, however, many people who would pick fights with them.

Mr. REYNOLDS. So it is in the case of nations, because, after all, a nation is nothing but an aggregation of individuals.

Mr. FRAZIER. If the Senator was as well prepared as Jack Dempsey he would be ready to take him on, and that is the way with nations.

Referring to the World War and preparedness in 1917, as I recall Hon. William Jennings Bryan, who was well informed on the war situation at that time, having been Secretary of State a short time previously, said, in substance, that the nations that were best armed were the nations that got into the war, and he said further, if the United States had been as well armed as the big Army and Navy crowd had advocated, undoubtedly the United States would have been in the war among the first instead of getting into it, as it did, 2 or 3 years later.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am not in accord with that contention. As I said a moment ago, I believe that if we had been properly prepared in April 1917 it never would have been necessary for the United States to have sent any men to foreign shores, because we could have delivered word to Germany to the effect that, unless the war was brought to an end, we would participate, and the Germans would have known that we would have been in a position to have stopped the war. However, Germany knew in April 1917 that we were not prepared, and, as a result, just a mere statement of our position would not have had any effect. We never would have had to have sent any transports over there, the first of which, I believe, went over on June 14, 1917, if we had been prepared at the time.

Getting back to the question of the National Guard, I think that is one arm of our service of defense that we should develop, because, as the Senator from Missouri has said, and likewise as has been stated by the Senator from Maryland, the men who participated in the activities of the National Guard are not paid. They join the service merely as a result of their patriotism, and we should lend encouragement to them and not reduce the appropriation, as it has been reduced in this instance.

I am in accord and agreement with my colleague from Oklahoma. I should like to see him get $1,000,000 for Oklahoma, because I know how he loves his State and how the people of Oklahoma love him. I know how thoroughly and sincerely interested he is in the State of Oklahoma. The people there could not have a representative here who would work harder in their interest or be of any greater benefit to them than is the Senator from Oklahoma, and I should like to see him have the money for his State; but, at the same time, I do not want to see any money taken away from my State of North Carolina or any other State of the Union. I want the National Guard to have the benefit of the money, and I am going to ask the Senate to reject the committee amendment in line 1, page 53.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on line 1, page 53.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ascertain if I understand the question properly. As I understand, the committee has recommended an appropriation for the National Guard to the full amount allowed by the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. COPELAND. And $734,000 in addition.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask how much was the amount which the Bureau of the Budget allowed for the National Guard.

Mr. COPELAND. The Bureau of the Budget allowed $1,468,000 less than we have in the bill, to put it the other way, for it is a little difficult for me to answer without having a break-down of the figures.

Mr. BORAH. In any event, the bill carries what the Bureau of the Budget allowed and $734,000 in addition?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word to the Senator from Oklahoma. He is no more guilty in this case than is the Senator from North Carolina. He made an appeal for Fort Sill, so effective an appeal that it reached the hearts of the committee, and that is doing pretty well. He did not have any idea where we were going to put the amendment in the bill and neither did I; the experts did that; but, anyway, we decided, separate and apart and independent of Fort Sill and everything else, that the House had gone too far when it exceeded the Budget by nearly a million and a half dollars.

There are those in this Chamber who believe in some degree of economy. I do. I do not want it to be in connection with the National Guard, but the National Guard is not going to be hurt at all. It may have a little less band music when it wants it; it may have a little less gasoline for the officers' cars; but the National Guardsmen, the human beings who make up the rank and file, will be exactly the same in number; they will have the same subsistence; they will have the same uniforms; they will have the same travel pay. There will not, however, be the frills and other things which would be provided if we went beyond the needs of the Guard, and provided a million and a half dollars more. So, in our wisdom or lack of it, whichever way you may care to put it, we said, "Here is a place where we can save several hundred thousand dollars", and we proceeded to do so.

Then when the experts wrote the bill they placed the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] in this unfortunate place, and he is being "damned from hell to breakfast" for something he did not have anything to do with, and which has nothing to do with the matter at issue. [Laughter.]

So far as the Senate is concerned, if it wants to vote more money for the National Guard and exceed the Budget estimate by that amount, that is a matter for the Senate to determine for itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment on page 53, line 1, striking out "$12,360,591" and inserting "$12,032,229."

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 53, line 12, after the word "immediately", to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the subappropriation for expenses, camps of instruction, etc., may be increased not to exceed $625,000 by transfer from other sums appropriated in this act under the heading "National Guard", exclusive of pay for armory drills: Provided further, That there shall be expended for the extension of the concurrent camp, Fort Sill, Okla.: For construction and installation of buildings and appurtenances thereto, including interior facilities, fixed, movable, and office equipment, necessary services, roads, swimming pool, connections to water, sewer, gas, and electric mains, purchase and installation of telephone equipment, and similar improvements, and procurement of transportation incident thereto, without reference to sections 1136 and 3734 of the Revised Statutes, including general overhead expenses of transportation, engineering, supplies, inspection, and supervision, travel connected therewith, and such services as may be necessary in the office of the Quartermaster General, not to exceed $405,638.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have a telegram from the adjutant general of North Dakota, in which he states:

Fort Sill camp item unfair to all States except Oklahoma, and all other States will be penalized to make up total amount for this construction.

That is apparently the way the National Guard of North Dakota feel about this appropriation for Oklahoma. They feel that if Oklahoma is going to have money for a fine National Guard swimming pool and all that, they should have as much in their States. I am inclined to think the adjutant general of North Dakota is right.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, that has just been taken care of by rejecting the committee amendment on page 53, line 1. Let us leave Oklahoma alone. That is taken care of in the natural way, and, so far as I am concerned, I am very happy over the whole arrangement. If I had not been in charge of the bill I should have voted to reject the amendment, but I did the best I could, and I hope the RECORD shows that I did.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment just adopted, and for which I voted, I want to place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks sundry telegrams concerning the matter which has just been settled, as I understand, in accordance with the wishes of the senders of the telegrams.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a telegram from Frederick C. Hummell, president of the Idaho National Guard Association, in opposition to the Fort Sill appropriation.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOISE, IDAHO, June 19, 1937.

Senator JAMES P. POPE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Request your influence in making following changes Army appropriation bill: Page 53, line 1, restore amount to House figures; page 53, line 17, strike out entire proviso reference construction camp Fort Sill, $405,638; page 67, line 5, restore item to House figures. Fort Sill camp item unfair to all States except Oklahoma; all other States will be penalized to make up total amount for this construction.

FREDERICK C. HUMMEL,
President, Idaho National Guard Association.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the same connection I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a message of protest from Gen. George A. White, of the Oregon National Guard.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALEM, OREG., June 18, 1937.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate:

War Department appropriation bill unsatisfactory to National Guard in three items. Will appreciate your help to accomplish following: Page 53, line 1, restore amount to House figures; page 53, line 17, strike out entire proviso reference construction camp Fort Sill, $405,638; page 67, line 5, restore item to House figures. The Fort Sill item unfair to all States except Oklahoma, since other States would be penalized to make up amount for this construction. Will appreciate your cooperation.

Regards,

Gen. GEORGE A. WHITE.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I, too, have received telegrams relating to this provision in the bill. I ask unanimous consent that they may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., June 18, 1937.

Senator MATTHEW M. NEELY,
Washington, D. C.:

Respectfully request that War Department appropriation bill, page 53, line 1, be restored to House figures. Also proviso reference construction of camp at Fort Sill, Okla., be stricken out; unfair to all States except Oklahoma. Further request page 67, line 5, be restored to House figures. Your assistance in this matter urgently requested.

H. B. CORNWELL,
Executive Officer,
One Hundred and Fiftieth Infantry.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., June 18, 1937.

Senator MATTHEW M. NEELY:

War Department appropriation bill very unsatisfactory to West Virginia; urge that page 53, line 1, be restored to House figures. Also that the proviso reference construction of camp at Fort Sill, Okla., be stricken out; unfair to all States except Oklahoma. Further requested page 67, line 5, be restored to House figures. Your assistance in this matter urgently requested.

WM. L. HORNOR,
Adjutant General.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, may I inquire what relation there is between the appropriation contained on page 53 of the pending bill, beginning in line 18, relating to Fort Sill, and the item in S. 2649, Calendar 773, page 3, entitled "Fort Sill, Okla., barracks, $330,000; telephone construction, $1,000; total, $331,000"? The object of my question is to ascertain whether there is a sum of $331,000 authorized in Senate bill 2649 in addition to the sum of $405,638 appropriated in House bill 6692, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on this reservation in Oklahoma we have a Regular Army Establishment known as Fort Sill. It is headquarters for a school of fire, which is headquarters for training Army officers in the handling of small cannon. For some 4 or 5 years the Government has been building up the Regular Establishment and there is an authorization in the pending bill to add some new buildings at the Regular Establishment.

The item in the bill before the Senate at the moment is for what is known as a concurrent camp, a camp for training National Guardsmen, the C. M. T. C., the R. O. T. C., and other Reserve officers. While they are both on the same reservation, the two establishments are some distance apart and are two separate and distinct camps. The item just inquired about by the Senator from Vermont is for the Regular Establishment and will come up hereafter. The item in the bill before us this afternoon is for the Guard camp on the same reservation, but some distance away from the Regular Army camp.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, among the telegrams which I asked a moment ago to have inserted in the RECORD is one from a number of officers, and I wish to invite the particular attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to this telegram. The senders of the message urge me to vote to "strike out entire proviso reference construction Camp Fort Sill", and "page 67, line 5, restore item to House figures." They continue in the message as follows:

The Fort Sill camp item unfair to all States except Oklahoma and we would be penalized to make up total amount for this construction. Urge your attention to this matter in accordance with above as best interests of entire National Guard demands same.

The message is signed by Col. R. H. Bond, Maj. Hu. I. Mainord, Maj. Lee F. Ware, Capt. A. U. Taylor, Capt. W. L. Frankland, Capt. A. P. Reasonover, and Capt. G. R. Windrom. It seems that these gentlemen think this camp is to be paid for out of the general expense fund of the National Guard. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state what are the facts?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Tennessee that we have just gone over that matter from start to finish. It is all in the RECORD. If the Senator wants to take the time to go into it again, very well. We have restored the amount of money proposed by the House to be appropriated. This sum does not come out of the National Guard. It comes out of a saving which, unfortunately, the Senate committee attempted to make, but which has now been thwarted, overcome, dissolved, and dissipated by the action of the Senate in rejecting the amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am one of the Senators who did not vote with the committee with reference to that amendment. I voted to retain the amount proposed to be appropriated by the House. I was not in the Chamber at the moment and did not hear the explanation of the Senator from Oklahoma in regard to the matter. May I ask him if the Senator from New York has correctly stated the situation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, if this money is made available it will not affect the National Guard establishment in the other States. If in conference it is found by the conferees that the building of this equipment at Fort Sill is going to reduce the appropriation for the National Guard camp in other States, then I shall request that this item be withdrawn.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the amendment, although I think that even rejection of the committee amendment on page 53, line 1, necessarily does affect to some extent the support which is to be given to the National Guard as a whole. I am not in opposition to the amendment, because if there is any place in the United States where troops are located that the Government ought to spend money for additional and extraordinary comfort for the troops, it is at Fort Sill, Okla.

It was extremely unfortunate, in my opinion, that the War Department ever saw fit to place troops at Fort Sill. I put in one of the best years of my life at Camp Doniphan, in Fort Sill, during the World War. I think the records of the War Department, if they have been maintained, will show that during the occupation of Camp Doniphan by the Thirty-fifth Division in 1917–18 we had the honor of having the highest temperature of any camp in the United States, and a few months later had the honor of having the lowest temperature of any camp in the United States. We also had the honor of having the longest protracted dry spell during that fall, and the following spring had the longest wet spell of any camp in the United States. When we moved in, it was in the midst of a dust storm so terrific that it blinded the drivers of our wagons and artillery. When we moved out, some months later, it was after such terrific rains that our wagons and guns, as well as our men, were almost engulfed in mud.

While I think it is very unfortunate that the War Department in its wisdom ever saw fit to compel troops, particularly in peacetime, when it is not necessary, to endure the rigors of Camp Doniphan at Fort Sill, yet since the Government has done so, I think it owes an obligation to those troops to spend money there for every possible comfort, even luxury, for those troops.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on page 53, beginning at line 12.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Organized Reserves", on page 58, line 7, after the words "in all" and the comma, to change the appropriation for pay and allowances of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps on active duty in accordance with law, etc., from $10,297,906 to $9,355,506.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to address myself briefly to the bill. Perhaps my remarks might more properly be directed to the joint military appropriations that are made for both the Army and the Navy.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] this afternoon presented an estimate of the cost up to date of the participation of the United States in the World War. He estimated that at the moment he understood it to be in the neighborhood of $50,000,000,000. A more recent study which has come to my attention has revealed that the cost has already gone beyond the $70,000,000,000 mark. That it will ultimately reach $100,000,000,000 I think no man can longer doubt.

I have before me at the moment a very interesting study revealing how much money $70,000,000,000 is. This study tells us that the cost of the World War to the United States up to date is equal to the cost of all the schools in the United States, plus the cost of education for 5 years in the United States, plus the cost of all the surfaced roads in the United States, plus the cost of all medical care for 5 years in the United States, plus all fire losses for 20 years in the United States. Those items alone make a total of $55,000,000,000. When we contemplate the fact that before the entire cost of the World War is met it is going to aggregate $100,000,000,000, or twice the figure I have just given, one can better understand the keen resentment throughout the land toward those who contemplate our possible participation in another foreign war.

It was Victor Berger who originally estimated, and the president of Columbia University, Nicholas Murray Butler, who has so well repeated the picture of what the war has cost the world. It is his estimate that if we today had what 4 years of war cost the world, we could go forth and build homes costing $2,500 apiece on 5-acre plots of ground costing $100 an acre, place $1,000 worth of furniture in each such home, give a home like that free of all incumbrance to every family residing today in Russia, Italy, France, Belgium, Germany, Holland, Wales, Ireland, Scotland, England, Australia, Canada, and the United States, and then find ourselves with a balance that would enable us to go into every community of 20,000 persons or more in all the countries I have named and bestow a $2,000,000 library, a $3,000,000 hospital, and a $10,000,000 university and, after doing that, have enough money left so that if we invested a part of the balance so wisely as to make certain a return of 5 percent per year, that return alone would enable us to pay salaries of $1,000 apiece to 125,000 school teachers and 125,000 nurses. Then we should find a sufficient balance left so that, if we chose to do it, we could go into France and Germany and possess ourselves of every penny's worth of property that exists in those lands today.

It is only when we have the cost of war pictured to us in that manner that we can properly appreciate the keen desire of so many persons to avoid, if possible, a recurrence of costs which can bring only one result, that result that all war has brought; namely, what in this modern day we term "depression", the degree of depression only reflecting the degree of cost of the waste involved in war itself, with, in the end, no really worth-while object accomplished.

We now have before us the annual appropriation bill for the War Department. I have before me the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year ending June 30, 1936. At page 362 of that report is an accounting of our Government's military expenditures down to the past year, starting with 1877. Following in that report the columns devoted to the showing of expenditures for our Military Establishment, one is impressed with the tremendous increase that has come year after year in the name of national defense here in our own country.

We may take out our displeasure on other nations for their mad expenditures in the name of national defense; but up until a very few years ago, I think only 3 years ago, there was no nation on earth which was spending so much money in preparation for another war as we were spending here in the United States.

The Senator from North Carolina speaks of the tremendous number of men who are engaged in the standing Army of Russia at the present time and the tremendous consequent outlay, and at the same time he pleads that the best way to prevent war is to be prepared for it. One wonders, when he puts the two conclusions together, if the Senator from North Carolina desires to Russianize the United States so far as the size of its Army is concerned. Does the fact that one country may have greatly enlarged its military strength indicate that our national defense requires equal strength in a military way so far as we are concerned?

Back in 1913, the year before the World War broke out, the total outlay of the United States in preparation for war was a little less than $350,000,000. That, of course was exclusive of the so-called nonmilitary activities of both the Army and the Navy. This year, with the passage of the bill that is pending before us, our outlay in the name of the national defense for both the Army and the Navy will be $1,123,000,000. We are spending today between three and four times as much in preparation for another war or in the name of national defense as we were spending the year before the war came which finally led the United States off into the cause of "ending war"—a cause which, if we won, was to free the world from the necessity of this mad preparation for more and more wars.

Reverting to the table in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I ask unanimous consent that the columns of that report revealing the annual expenditures for the Navy Department and for the War Department may be included in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Mr. NYE. In the name of national defense we enact these appropriation bills. I am not opposed to national defense. Indeed, I am sure no one is more solicitous than I am that his country be adequately prepared to repulse an attack, if attack comes; but daily I grow stronger in my conviction that the things we do in the name of national defense do not really, honestly, sincerely have national defense as their purpose.

Recently published by the Foreign Policy Association is a so-called headline book entitled "Billions for Defense." I am going to bother the Senate to the extent of reading only three or four paragraphs from that very interesting presentation, which carries a splendid array of charts revealing the comparative costs of military preparation throughout the world.

Opening the volume is this very interesting approach:

How much have the nations of the world spent for national defense during the past 5 years? Sixty governments spent nearly $4,000,000,000 in 1932, five billion in 1934, eleven billion in 1936. A total of $32,000,000,000 during just 5 years! And how much is $32,000,000,000? So much that you can't count it. It's enough to build 46 Panama Canals. It would replace the buildings of all American colleges and universities 14 times.

Or let us compare present-day expenditures for armament with what was spent before the World War. The year before that war the nations spent approximately two and a half billion dollars. Today the nations are spending four times as much as they did then, and are increasing their budgets at twice the rate. What is more, the standing armies are stronger by a million men than they were then. And there are strange, amazingly powerful weapons, that were unknown to the men who marched off to war only 23 years ago.

Several nations are spending more than half of their total budgets for armaments while many others are using from 20 to 40 percent for war preparations. This means that out of every dollar raised by the government from 20 to 50 cents goes into national defense.

WHO PAYS THE BILL

Who pays for all this? Why, the people, of course. And how does the government raise the money? First, by collecting taxes. Many kinds of taxes have been devised—on individual incomes, on profits from business, on luxuries, on tobacco, on theater tickets, even on food. In Germany Nazi leaders tell their people that they must prefer "cannon to butter." In Italy millions of men and women gave their wedding rings and their jewelry to the Government to provide gold to pay for the Ethiopian war.

And secondly, these huge bills are paid with borrowed money on which the people must pay the interest for years to come. Not one of the great powers is now able to meet its expenses without borrowing. Great Britain recently startled the world by announcing a colossal rearmament program costing $7,500,000,000 over a period of 5 years. Unable to pay the full costs out of its normal budget, the British Government is following in the path of other countries by floating an armament loan. France has borrowed heavily from its citizens to meet its military budget ever since Hitler came to power in Germany in 1933. Italy borrowed millions of lira to meet the cost of its campaign in Ethiopia. And no one knows how much Germany has borrowed to carry out its gigantic rearmament program.

The world has learned from bitter experience what it means to spend borrowed money for such purposes. For one thing prices begin to rise. The spending of money for war materials creates an increased demand for iron, steel, copper, coal, and other commodities. At first, perhaps, it is the prices of these articles only which go up. But later, as costs of production increase, other prices begin to rise, too. In the end, the price of practically everything which men and women need goes up. Meanwhile, their fixed salaries do not rise, and their savings which mean their insurance against a rainy day begin to disappear. When wage earners can no longer afford to pay high prices, the demand for goods stops abruptly and there is a crash in prices. Economists call this spiral of rising prices inflation. In the crash of 1929, millions of Americans learned what such a boom meant. In recent months economists have begun to warn that the armament race is leading rapidly to another period of dangerous inflation. But military budgets continue to expand.

WHAT THE PEOPLE ARE TOLD

Of course, no government is willing to admit that it is preparing for a war of aggression. All countries at all times have said that their armaments are not for purposes of attack but only for defense. The governments give their people various reasons for their swollen war budgets.

The people of France have been told that they must sacrifice for "security", and to most Frenchmen the word "security" means defense against invasion from across the Rhine. British statesmen have explained to their people that armaments are needed to preserve peace and to make it possible for England to support a strong League of Nations. Russian workers and peasants have contributed from their wages in order that the first Socialist state may be protected from the dangers of attack by "greedy capitalist nations" or Fascist enemies. Germans have become convinced that without powerful armaments they cannot hope to win "equality" among the nations of Europe. Americans are told that a navy "second to none" is essential for "adequate" defense of the Nation.

And so on, and on and on, revealing in the end only the mad circle in which every generation down through all the time of civilization has been made to run in the name of national defense.

Mr. President, though believing in national defense, I deny that preparation for war is any guarantee against war. I do not think there can be cited any case where preparation for war on a large scale has done anything other than ultimately lead to war. However that may be, the question of what constitutes national defense is the one which occasioned my asking the Senate for time this afternoon, and I shall be as brief as I possibly can.

Because of these mad expenditures, increasing from year to year, in the name of national defense, some people are growing thoroughly uneasy about the frightful increases in national budgets and about the direction in which the nations of the world are moving. There is a great effort to explain from day to day some of these expenditures in the name of national defense. Our own military establishment is disowning some of the expenditures made in its name. There was effort made in connection with the very bill pending before us at the present time to separate the military from the alleged nonmilitary activities of the Government.

The War Department is charged with the administration of the national military cemeteries, but the Department, according to its effort of recent weeks, wants this item charged as being nonmilitary. It would seem that once a man dies in the military service, after giving his life to it, the care of his grave no longer becomes in any degree a military obligation.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator stated a moment ago that many of the nations which are making appropriations of billions upon billions of dollars annually have given as a reason the fact that they were preparing for self-defense. I ask the Senator whether he does not think that in some instances of the larger nations making tremendous appropriations for expenditure for war purposes they are really forced to do so?

The Senator a moment ago, reading from a magazine relative to peacetime appropriations for war in the future, mentioned Great Britain having recently made an appropriation of $7,400,000,000 to be spent over a period of a certain number of years. I am of the opinion that in a very large sense Great Britain was warranted in making such an appropriation, and the probabilities are she did make the appropriations in order to prepare to defend her own, having this in mind: As the Senator knows, Great Britain controls 500,000,000 people, which is one-fourth of the population of the earth. She virtually controls a fourth of the earth; her possessions being in the Dutch East Indies, in the West Indies, in Central America, in Australia, in New Zealand, in India, in South Africa, in northern Africa, and in North America. On the British Isles there reside a population of from forty to fifty million, all of whom are dependent upon industries the products of which go to the various possessions in the four corners of the earth which are controlled by Great Britain. As we know, Great Britain has a life line. That life line extends from the British Isles southward to Gibraltar, then through the Mediterranean, and down through the Suez Canal to the Red Sea, the Indian Ocean, to Singapore, southward through the Dutch East Indies, to Melbourne, to Sydney, to Brisbane, and to Wellington, the capital of New Zealand.

The greatest enemy Great Britain has today upon the face of the earth, and the most dangerous enemy, an enemy which is in a position to sever the life line of Great Britain, is Italy, because Italy has just about gotten to a point where she is virtually in control of all shipping through the Mediterranean. She is seeking today to get control of Spain so that she may construct fortifications on the Spanish coast. She has possessions in northern Africa. About 50 or 60 years ago she acquired what was known as Italian Eritrea, and just below there she has Italian Somaliland. She of all nations is in a position actually to sever the life line of Great Britain. That is the trouble Great Britain is experiencing in that part of the world.

In the Orient, where Great Britain has tremendous interests, as we all know she owns the island of Hong Kong, the capital of which is Victoria, which is usually referred to as the city of Hong Kong. Great Britain realizes that the day will come when the Japanese, in their desire to create the empire of the Orient, are going to have to take possession of the island of Hong Kong; and they have pushed their frontier to Singapore. Great Britain evidently realizes her danger in the Orient. Otherwise she would not have already made an expenditure of more than $350,000,000 in constructing fortifications at Singapore and in the Province of Johore.

In view of the tremendous territory where Great Britain controls 500,000,000 people in all parts of the world, in view of that well-known life line of Great Britain, I am rather inclined to think that in a large sense she is warranted in making appropriations of $7,400,000,000 for defense because the prosperity of the forty or fifty million who make up the population of the British Isles today depends upon their finding an outlet, and a profitable one, for the products issuing from the factories in England, principally at Birmingham, and Lancaster, and the other centers.

In view of that situation confronted by Great Britain, I will ask the Senator whether he does not in a sense concur with me that she is warranted in making that expenditure.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it is not for me even to undertake to ascertain what the needs of another power upon this earth may be from the standpoint of national defense. There is not a nation that is not made to feel that it needs the national defense which the increasing appropriations called for are presumed to afford. There is not a power on earth that is not sold on the idea that it is not so much national defense they need to keep prepared for as it is an ability to take the offensive in the event some other power gets saucy some day.

However much we may want to prevent it, there is at least one power on this earth which is thoroughly sold on the idea that its entire national defense is called for by reason of the preparations which the United States has made to attack that particular country. There is not a soul in the United States who would not at once deny that the United States has any such idea as that; but it does occasion the large budget for national defense of that particular country; and so it goes on down through all the powers.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I desire to state to the Senator that it is my understanding of his attitude that he believes in an Army and Navy purely for self-defense.

Mr. NYE. Precisely.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I wish to say to the Senator that I am in thorough accord with his position.

Mr. NYE. And I may say to the Senator that I am undertaking now to elaborate somewhat upon what we mean by "national defense."

I had made the point of the manner in which military leaders are now seeking to get away from responsibility for some of the expenditures made in the name of national defense, and I had referred to the Military Establishment being anxious to get away from the responsibility for military cemeteries. The incident was interesting, and I want to make the point only because it reveals the present effort to run away from the responsibility for the annual increase in the military budget, which today alone in our country is larger than was the cost of maintaining all the departments of our Government, including the Army and the Navy, in the year before we went into the World War.

It is time indeed that men did begin to fear responsibility for the mad "defense" races of nations, especially ours. Particularly is this true at a time when we fuss about expenditures for relief of the needy, and talk about the need for "balancing budgets." There never was such an opportunity for the practice of economy as in the appropriations for the Army and the Navy, but we seldom, if ever, even consider economy there. We have devoted the better part of a week to the discussion of the possibility of accomplishing economies in the relief joint resolution. I venture to say that the pending military bill, calling for an appropriation of over $600,000,000, which came before the Senate at about half-past two this afternoon, will be passed before the day is much older.

More and more are mounting military budgets challenging the people. More and more are the people demanding to know just what is our goal through these expenditures. There has been a lot of earnest thinking on the subject during late years, some of it culminating in splendid works by authors of renown. A most challenging work is that by Hallgren entitled "The Tragic Fallacy", recently off the press.

The Tragic Fallacy is a straightforward challenge to the War and Navy Departments, to the General Staff, and the General Board. It is a challenge which they may elect to ignore, but neither the Congress nor the American people can afford to ignore the issues Mauritz Hallgren raises in this book; for, in short, he declares that the Army and Navy are preparing not for a war in defense of American territory but for another war abroad, for another war to be fought on foreign soil. He asserts, for example, that the General Staff is even neglecting the territorial defenses in developing its plans for another huge expeditionary force to be sent across the ocean.

Hallgren analyzes the problem of invasion. His analysis is based largely, if not exclusively, upon official documents, upon the records of the A. E. F., and similar sources. He comes to the conclusion, which cannot successfully be disputed, that the probabilities of an invasion of our country are practically nil. Indeed, he goes further and declares that invasion is wholly out of the question, for political and economic as well as for strategic reasons.

Thus he says (pp. 53–54):

> • • • which power or powers might be likely to try to invade American territory? Certainly not Canada or Mexico or any of the Latin American countries. A European power? Great Britain would never dare take its eyes off Europe long enough to endeavor to invade and conquer America; it would never dare expose itself to a possible attack from the Continent while the whole of its navy and most of its army were off fighting the United States. France, ever fearing a German war of revenge and gradually losing its hegemony in European affairs, would surely not think of further weakening its position at home by diverting any part of its military machine to such a risky venture.
> Germany has all that it can do to keep from bankruptcy at the same time that it seeks to divide Europe against itself in the hope of creating an opening for a war of conquest in eastern Europe; it would certainly not drop everything, leave its French frontier unguarded, and give up all of its ambitions in central and eastern Europe on the virtually impossible chance that it might succeed in making a colony of America. For all of Mussolini's bombast, Italy is a minor power, a poor country, which may be able to subdue another minor power in its own neighborhood, but which must rely mainly on bluff in dealing with a major power.

This is not my language, I may say to the Senate. That is the language of the author of The Tragic Fallacy, Mr. Hallgren.

Mr. Hallgren continues:

> The Soviet Union, with a hopeful Germany on one flank and a distraught and reckless Japan on the other, and with, moreover, a tremendous economic problem at home likely to engage its attention for years to come, neither has the desire nor could spare the men and equipment for a war of dubious purposes on the other side of the earth. Japan lacks ships and natural resources and allies, all of which it would have to have for a hostile expedition to be undertaken across 7,000 miles of open sea. Besides, Japan has cut out for itself a job—the stupendous one of bending the Chinese giant to its will—that is certain to keep it well occupied for years, perhaps decades.
> Looking over the international situation, it seems very difficult indeed to find a respectable enemy.

And what would the enemy hope to gain by invading and conquering our country or any substantial part of it? Would loot be the objective? Tribute? Trade? If none of these, what, then? These are some more of the questions Hallgren asks—questions that the admirals and generals never bother to answer when they ask for more and still more money for "defense."

A victorious enemy—

Hallgren continues (pp. 54–56)—

> would not take the currency of a conquered nation. It would do him no good in his own territory, and its removal would wreck the economy of the beaten country. He would not confiscate securities, for these would be worthless paper unless he could keep the conquered nation's credit on a solvent basis and its industry operating at a normal rate. How many enemy soldiers would be needed to stand over the bankers, manufacturers, workers, and farmers of the United States in order to compel them to continue producing goods so that the enemy might enrich himself by clipping coupons and collecting dividends? In truth, the sabotage, even supposing that enough enemy soldiers could be found for the purpose, would reach such enormous proportions that again the national economy would break down. Witness only what happened in Germany after France marched its troops into the Ruhr on just such a mission.

Nor could the enemy afford to take goods, either capital or consumption goods, in lieu of money or interest and dividends. He would himself be faced with a problem of overproduction and unemployment, as every industrial power is today. What good, then, would it do him to add to his own industrial surplus by taking American products? And would that not throw still more millions of his own workers out of employment? (Indeed, if an enemy could be persuaded to do just this, would that not provide a solution for the American economic problem?) Moreover, as Beverly Nichols has asked, why should a nation that erects prohibitive tariffs to keep out another nation's goods as a matter of self-protection in time of peace, suddenly abolish its protective tariffs and let in such goods just because it has defeated the other nation? But that is the truly ridiculous step a victorious country would have to take if it were to seek to exact payment or tribute from a defeated America in the form of goods. * * *

Lastly, would the victor attempt bodily to annex the United States? If American property rights, political institutions, and civil liberties were left undisturbed, the average American would hardly notice the change, though that would not mean that the American people would ever consent to the annexation. However, the conqueror would derive no profit from an arrangement under which the American Republic, apart perhaps from swapping its flag for that of the victor, was left to go on as before. This would not compensate him in the slightest for the effort and expense he had gone to. If he were to annex the country, he would certainly try to rule it as he saw fit. How long could this alien rule last? How many policemen would be needed to keep 130,000,000 free-born Americans in their place? Where is the foreign country that would even dream of attempting anything like this? One has only to ask the questions to demonstrate how utterly absurd the whole business is.

So, as Hallgren says, the likelihood of invasion is so remote from the political and economic point of view as to be practically nonexistent. But even if by some miracle one foreign power or another should find an excuse for making the attempt, that power would still have to solve the problem of getting its army across the ocean. Here, again, Hallgren goes into painstaking detail to show that the problem is virtually impossible of solution. He points out that Army officers have supposed that an enemy force of 300,000 men might be brought against the United States in a single expedition. This supposition is based on the fact that the largest number of American soldiers transported in a single month to France during the World War was 306,000. But Hallgren proves conclusively that that feat cannot possibly be duplicated, or even approached, by an enemy seeking to invade the United States.

He inquires at length into the records of the A. E. F. and into studies of naval experts both here and abroad to determine what would be needed to move such an expeditionary force across the ocean. He shows that the expedition itself would have to include at least 580 ships, not including the naval escort. Then he cites the latest shipping statistics to show that, save Great Britain, no power on earth has enough ocean-going shipping to provide for such a monstrous expedition, and that the British would never dare to divert as many ships as this from their vital food services and industries, for such diversion would mean hunger and economic collapse in England.

More than that, Hallgren continues (p. 61):

> It would be madness itself to send such an armada across the open ocean on a hostile mission. To maintain reasonably effective command and intership communication, such as would be indispensible to the movement of the expedition, would be a superhuman task. The fleet could never be kept together in adverse weather. To protect it from harassment by American submarines and surface raiders (it must be supposed that the American battle fleet has already been wiped out) would require an enormous naval guard, and that would add to the difficulties of command and communication. Lastly, the expedition could move no faster than its slowest unit, which would mean that its speed would have to be kept down to about or below 10 knots. To imagine such a ponderous and slow-moving giant launching a surprise attack upon the American coast is to give way to sheer fantasy.

Hallgren estimates that at the very outside—and there he is generous in the extreme—an enemy might consider moving a force of 50,000 men against this country. Even that would require about 58 ships. But before an enemy could as much as think of getting together an expedition of this smaller but still unwieldly size he must first dispose of the American Navy; and it must be remembered that in its own waters the American Navy is supreme; no other fleet on earth can defeat it there. The A. E. F. faced no such problem, for in 1917 the British and American Navies controlled the Atlantic. Defeat of the Navy would be only the first step. Then the expedition would have to be sent across, a gigantic task in itself. A landing place would have to be found and captured, and that landing place could be in none of our harbors, since, as Hallgren points out elsewhere in his book, not one of our harbors, if properly fortified, can be taken by a hostile fleet. The first attack would have to take place somewhere along the naked and unprotected coast, and then, presuming that victory has fallen to the enemy in this initial attack, he would have to begin the superhuman task of landing his expedition, which, without harbor facilities and the like, would take him weeks. And then the war will have only just begun.

Step by step this work from which I am quoting so liberally traces the difficulties that would confront an enemy bent upon invading this country. Step by step it shows the impossible becoming ever more impossible. The enemy must perform one miracle after another in order to achieve even his first objective. Having performed these several miracles, having attained the impossible, having finally, that is, landed a small force on American soil, where would the enemy then be? He would be thousands of miles from home, in a hostile foreign land. His would be an isolated force of definitely limited strength, dependent solely upon the equipment and supplies it had brought along. And this enemy force would be facing an American army defending its own soil, an army with the resources of a nation of 130,000,000 people at its immediate command, in control of a great network of railroads and highways and other lines of communication, and intimately acquainted with the terrain over which the war would be fought; an army, in short, that would be overwhelmingly superior, man for man, to any invading force that could possibly be landed on American shores. In other words, the enemy would be facing certain suicide.

Where is the foreign power that is going to try anything like that? Where is the foreign government so mad that it will deliberately set out to achieve the impossible, to send a hostile force across either ocean to invade the United States, when it knows that even if it succeeded in this undertaking, certain and complete destruction would be awaiting its army upon our shores? No one is going to try that, no one is even going to dream of trying it.

"Indeed", as Hallgren says in The Tragic Fallacy (p. 69), "the generals and admirals simply cannot show that America stands in any danger of being invaded." Moreover, he continues, "so little has the probability of invasion figured in the making of 'defense' policy that, were the impossible to happen and an invader actually to approach American shores, the Army might not be found ready to meet the emergency."

This, I point out, is a most startling statement, and I am going to repeat it:

> So little has the probability of invasion figured in the making of defense policy that, were the impossible to happen and an invader actually to approach American shores, the Army might not be found ready to meet the emergency.

That is because the Army is not built for defense but for participation in another mass war abroad. Hallgren declares that for land defense the country might have a small force, not exceeding 50,000 men, and even that number, he asserts, would be a luxury under the circumstances. But this force would have to be highly mobile, compact, complete in itself. The American Army, he says, is anything but that.

The country has instead—

Hallgren declares (p. 70)—

an army made up of far more divisions, brigades, and regiments than will ever be needed for such defense; and the available personnel, instead of being concentrated in a few units, has been spread exceedingly thin over these many units. For the Army is today that "expansible" affair for which Upton and his followers had long agitated. It is a sprawling military skeleton which it is intended in time of war to cover with flesh and blood, in the form of some hundreds of thousands—nay, millions—of raw or half-trained recruits. And until that is done the skeleton can hardly move; certainly it cannot fight.

Would such an army be able to stand off and defeat an invading force of, say, 50,000 men? Perhaps so, but it is obvious that it would take more time and cost more lives for such a lumbering, makeshift army to repel an invader than it would for a small, compact army which is complete in itself. That is all we need for territorial defense. Why do we lack such an army? Why do we have in its place this skeletonized affair that could not be gotten ready for war upon a moment's notice and has no place whatever in any bona-fide plan for the defense of the country's territory?

It is not for territorial defense that we have created this skeleton as a nucleus for another mass army. It is not for territorial defense that upward of 125,000 boys and men are now being trained to serve as officers of that army, enough officers to command an expeditionary force of 3,000,000 men. It is not for territorial defense that the General Staff envisages the employment of a "covering force" of 600,000 to 1,000,000 men. It is not for territorial defense that the General Staff plans to conscript "the manpower of the Nation" and so to add several million raw soldiers to this "covering force." Hallgren recalls that one general thought that as territorial defense this tremendous mass army is being provided for, since by no stretch of the imagination will it ever be needed to guard our soil.

We cannot charge the military men with being stupid in this regard, for that they most certainly are not. They know what they are about. They know that the danger of invasion is virtually nil. They know that a mass army, such as that for which they are making preparations, would be a handicap rather than a help in repelling a genuine invader. They know that this mass army, to which they are devoting practically all of their time and energy, can never be used for defense; that they can never hope to employ it except in another mass war on foreign soil. Indeed, it is all too painfully clear that that is the real objective of the present military policy. It is all too painfully clear that the Army is getting ready for another war abroad.

If—

As Hallgren says—

the generals have been reluctant to discuss this side of America's war preparations, the admirals have been forthright enough.

The admirals—

He declares—

do not pretend that their navy is nonaggressive or that it is intended merely to keep unwelcome intruders out of American waters. * * * Their major war plans all call for war in the enemy's waters.

But the Navy has a different problem. In trying to solve this problem, the Tragic Fallacy asserts, the admirals have fallen between two stools. They have a fleet much bigger than they need for actual territorial defense and yet not large enough to carry out the primary purpose of their existing policy, which is to guard the country's commerce and policies wherever they may be threatened. In truth, as the Tragic Fallacy puts it, that purpose can never be achieved.

Hallgren quotes at length from the writings and studies of naval experts, from testimony given before congressional committees by the admirals themselves, to show that the British would have to have a fleet at least twice as large as ours and the Japanese would have to have one three to five times as big in order to meet the American Fleet on anything like equal terms in its own territorial waters. Citing the very language of these admirals and other authoritative witnesses, he tells of the great loss of efficiency which a hostile fleet must expect in crossing thousands of miles of open ocean from either Europe or Asia. He goes into the question of naval bases and reveals that neither Britain nor any other power has fortified bases on this side of the ocean that can be used for offensive operations against the United States. He arrives at the inevitable conclusion that so long as the American Fleet stays in its own waters it is invulnerable; that, indeed, the United States could get along with less than parity and still enjoy perfect security as against any of its maritime rivals.

The admirals, of course, do not see it that way. Still deluded by all of Mahan's nonsense about "control of the seas", Hallgren declares they—

Continue to draw plans for fleet operations in distant waters. They continue to talk before congressional committees and elsewhere about steaming off in the grand manner to the British Isles (or to Japan), there to seek to defeat and destroy the British Fleet (or the Japanese).

All of which Hallgren denounces as "suicidal strategy."

Obviously, if a European power needs more than twice our strength to cross 3,000 miles of ocean, invade American waters, and there defeat our Navy, we must need twice the strength of any European fleet, say the British, in order to go into European waters and defeat that fleet or even to meet it on equal terms. As things stand at present, Hallgren says:

It would be little short of deliberate suicide for the American Fleet to venture out of its own territorial waters for the purpose of challenging British supremacy in the eastern Atlantic or the control which they exercise in the western Pacific.

It would be foolhardy for the United States to attempt anything of that sort unless it had a powerful naval ally abroad. But where and how is it to get such an ally? On the Pacific side there are only China and the Soviet Union, and neither of them has a navy. In Europe Germany, France, and Italy together have 105 percent of Britain's naval strength. But it would be impossible to add their navies to the American Fleet, not only because of political realities but also because of the technical difficulties that would be involved. Moreover, would not such an alliance automatically involve us in European politics, and would that not be the easiest and quickest way of involving us in another war abroad?

The only alternative would be for this country to try to outbuild its naval rivals. But that is next to impossible, Hallgren declares.

Under present political and economic circumstances—the United States cannot hope to attain decisive superiority in numbers. Does anyone suppose that the British and the Japanese would sit idly by while the United States was doubling its fleet? Such a fleet could only be used against Britain or Japan. The mere fact that it was being built would in London and Tokyo be considered prima-facie evidence of aggressive intent on the part of the United States. Indeed, the British and Japanese would not waste time inquiring at length into American motives, but would hasten to match the new American strength. The competition would be wholly automatic. The chances of America's successfully invading British or Japanese waters would remain as slim as ever. And no amount of naval bases abroad would help to mend this situation, for it is as certain as anything can be that, even though the United States had an adequate harbor placed at its disposal in Europe or Asia, the American Fleet could never reach that haven unless and until it were first to dispose of the enemy fleet, British or Japanese, and for that purpose the American Navy would have to be at least twice as big as the present British Fleet and more than three times as strong as the present Japanese Fleet.

He says—

These solid facts bother the admirals very little, if at all. They have today a fleet far larger than we need to defend our homes, but they still want a much bigger one. They want one big enough to go over and fight a first-class war in Europe or Asia. All of their plans look toward that one eventuality. In short, the admirals, like the generals, are not thinking in terms of territorial defense but almost exclusively in terms of another major war abroad. Their preparations, too, are pointed toward just such a war. Is that what the American people want?

As one who wants this country prepared at all hours to successfully defend itself against invasion, I plead that we undertake to determine the meaning of defense; that we sense the direction in which the generally used term of defense is taking us; that we stop this futile course, which has found us madly spending for defense, with no lessening in the demand for more and more of defense; that we confine ourselves strictly to defense if we would avoid national bankruptcy in an effort to obtain the impossible.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Can the Senator from North Dakota advise us concerning the amount Congress has spent during the past 5 or 6 years to maintain the military and naval establishments of the country and to take care of the cost of war?

It may be that the Senator referred to that subject at the beginning of his remarks.

Mr. NYE. No; I have not any such group of figures, but let us see what the appropriations were, say, for the past 6 years.

Mr. BONE. Yes.

Mr. NYE. Let us start in with 1930, when the appropriation for the War Department was $464,000,000, and for the Navy $374,000,000.

In 1931 the appropriation for the Army was $478,000,000, and for the Navy $354,000,000.

In 1932 the appropriation for the Army was $477,000,000, and for the Navy $357,000,000.

In 1933 the appropriation for the Army was $449,000,000, and for the Navy $349,000,000.

I should like to point out to the Senator from Washington and to the Senate the manner in which, during these years, the Navy has managed to catch up pretty well with the Army in the matter of national outlay in the Budget.

In 1934 the appropriation for the Army was $408,000,000, and for the Navy $297,000,000.

In 1935 the appropriation for the Army was $489,000,000, and for the Navy $436,000,000.

In 1936 the appropriation for the Army was $618,000,000, and for the Navy $529,000,000.

This year we have already appropriated $528,000,000 for the Navy, and now we are proposing to appropriate $610,000,000 for the Army.

Mr. BONE. Do the Senator's figures include the $238,000,000 allocated to the Navy from Public Works funds?

Mr. NYE. They do not.

Mr. BONE. Then that item should be added to the figures given by the Senator.

Mr. NYE. It should be.

Mr. BONE. The Senator also has not included the figures for the care of veterans, including hospitals, hospitalization, pensions, and the bonus.

Mr. NYE. No. The Senator might have included also the cost of war-debt retirement.

Mr. BONE. That is what I am getting at. I think the total probably would run close to $4,000,000,000 in the year 1936 alone, including the bonus, the cost of taking care of the veterans, their pensions, and the Army and the Navy. Has the Senator any figures indicating the total cost of war in the period he has covered?

Mr. NYE. No; I have not those figures readily at hand.

Mr. BONE. It probably would be a staggering sum.

Mr. NYE. It would be, of course. The more staggering conclusion, though, must be that those who have been responsible for these increases and for this staggering load are crying just as loudly today about the "inadequacy" of our national defense as they have ever cried before, and are just as madly striving for more and more on the pretense that our defense is inadequate. What is the end to be?

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, there are two very interesting aspects of this problem. One is that we rarely hear on the floor of the Senate any discussion about these very large sums of money that run into billions of dollars, while there are hours and hours and hours of discussion here on the floor about a billion and a half dollars to feed the hungry. I am not going to set myself up in judgment on the merits of this matter, except to point out that we have had weeks and weeks of discussion here about the matter of relief of the poor, but scarcely a murmur here about the expenditures for the cost of war, which is consuming a very large part of our Budget.

Second, another astonishing aspect of this problem is that we hear very little comment on these expenditures from the public at large, from church groups, or from those who are interested in peace and its various ramifications and aspects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead Citizens' military training—Reserve Officers' Training Corps, on page 62, line 12, after the word "wagons" and the comma, to strike out "$3,601,720" and insert "$4,219,570", so as to read:

For the procurement, maintenance, and issue, under the regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, to institutions at which one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained, of such public animals, means of transportation, supplies, tentage, equipment, and uniforms as he may deem necessary, including cleaning and laundering of uniforms and clothing at camps; and to forage, at the expense of the United States, public animals so issued, and to pay commutation in lieu of uniforms at a rate to be fixed annually by the Secretary of War; for transporting said animals and other authorized supplies and equipment from place of issue to the several institutions and training camps and return of same to place of issue when necessary; for purchase of training manuals, including Government publications and blank forms; for the establishment and maintenance of camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and for transporting members of such corps to and from such camps, and to subsist them while traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit, or, in lieu of transporting them to and from such camps and subsisting them while en route, to pay them travel allowance at the rate of 5 cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp and for the return travel thereto, and to pay the return travel pay in advance of the actual performance of the travel; for expenses incident to the use, including upkeep and depreciation costs, of supplies, equipment, and matériel furnished in accordance with law from stocks under the control of the War Department; for pay for students attending advanced camps at the rate prescribed for soldiers of the seventh grade of the Regular Army; for the payment of commutation of subsistence to members of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, at a rate not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as authorized in the act approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act approved June 4, 1920 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 387); for the medical and hospital treatment of members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, who suffer personal injury or contract disease in line of duty, and for other expenses in connection therewith, including pay and allowances, subsistence, transportation, and burial expenses, as authorized by the act of June 15, 1936 (49 Stat., p. 1507); for mileage, traveling expenses, or transportation, for transportation of dependents, and for packing and transportation of baggage, as authorized by law, for officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army traveling on duty pertaining to or on detail to or relief from duty with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor vehicles, including station wagons, $4,219,570, and, in addition, $517,850 of the appropriation "Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 1937", which is hereby reappropriated, and of the total amount hereby made available $400,000 shall be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "National Board for Promotion of Rifle Practice, Army", on page 67, line 5, after the name "Secretary of War", to strike out "$700,000" and insert "$645,726", so as to read:

Promotion of rifle practice: For construction, equipment, and maintenance of rifle ranges, the instruction of citizens in marksmanship, and promotion of practice in the use of rifled arms; for arms, ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target practice, for issue and sale in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice and approved by the Secretary of War; for clerical services, including not exceeding $25,000 in the District of Columbia; for procurement of materials, supplies, trophies, prizes, badges, and services, as authorized in section 113, act of June 3, 1916, and in War Department Appropriation Act of June 7, 1924; for the conduct of the national matches, including incidental travel, and for maintenance of the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, including not to exceed $7,500 for its incidental expenses as authorized by act of May 28, 1928; to be expanded under the direction of the Secretary of War, $645,726.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 19, to insert:

TITLE II—NONMILITARY ACTIVITIES OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

QUARTERMASTER CORPS

CEMETERIAL EXPENSES

For maintaining and improving national cemeteries, including fuel for and pay of superintendents and the superintendent at Mexico City, and other employees; purchase of land; purchase of tools and materials; purchase of one motor-propelled hearse at a cost not to exceed $3,150; and for the repair, maintenance, and operation of motor vehicles; care and maintenance of the Arlington Memorial Amphitheater, chapel, and grounds in the Arlington National Cemetery; repair to roadways but not to more than a single approach road to any national cemetery constructed under special act of Congress; headstones for unmarked graves of soldiers, sailors, and marines under the acts approved March 3, 1873 (U. S. C., title 24, sec. 279), February 3, 1879 (U. S. C., title 24, sec. 280), March 9, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 56), March 14, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 768), and February 26, 1929 (U. S. C., title 24, sec. 280a), and civilians interred in post cemeteries; recovery of bodies and disposition of remains of military personnel and civilian employees of the Army under act approved March 9, 1928 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 916); for repairs and preservation of monuments, tablets, roads, fences, etc., made and constructed by the United States in Cuba and China to mark the places where American soldiers fell; care, protection, and maintenance of the Confederate Mound in Oakwood Cemetery at Chicago, the Confederate Stockade Cemetery at Johnstons Island, the Confederate burial plots owned by the United States in Confederate Cemetery at North Alton, the Confederate Cemetery, Camp Chase, at Columbus, the Confederate Cemetery at Point Lookout, and the Confederate Cemetery at Rock Island, $1,227,009, of which $295,477 shall be available immediately: Provided, That no railroad shall be permitted upon any right-of-way which may have been acquired by the United States leading to a national cemetery, or to encroach upon any roads or walks constructed thereon and maintained by the United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for repairing any roadway not owned by the United States within the corporate limits of any city, town, or village.

SIGNAL CORPS

ALASKA COMMUNICATION SYSTEM

For operation, maintenance, and improvement of the Alaska Communication System and for purchase, including exchange, of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, and for operation and maintenance of vehicles of this character, $166,338, to be derived from the receipts of the Alaska Communication System which have been covered into the Treasury of the United States, and to remain available until the close of the fiscal year 1939: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress the extent and cost of any extensions and betterments which may be effected under this appropriation.

BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES HIGH COMMISSIONER TO THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

For the maintenance of the office of the United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands as authorized by subsection 4 of section 7 of the act approved March 24, 1934 (48 Stat. 456), including salaries and wages; rental, furnishings, equipment, maintenance, renovation, and repair of office quarters and living quarters for the High Commissioner; supplies and equipment; purchase and exchange of lawbooks and books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers; traveling expenses, including for persons appointed hereunder within the United States and their families, actual expenses of travel and transportation of household effects from their homes in the United States to the Philippine Islands, utilizing Government vessels whenever practicable; operation, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles, and all other necessary expenses, $152,600, of which amount not exceeding $10,000 shall be available for expenditure in the discretion of the High Commissioner for maintenance of his household and such other purposes as he may deem proper: Provided, That the salary of the legal adviser and the financial expert shall not exceed the annual rate of $12,000 and $10,000 each, respectively: Provided further, That section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), shall not apply to any purchase or service rendered under this appropriation when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $100.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS

RIVERS AND HARBORS

To be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and to remain available until expended:

For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation; for survey of northern and northwestern lakes and other boundary and connecting waters as heretofore authorized, including the preparation, correction, printing, and issuing of charts and bulletins and the investigation of lake levels; for prevention of obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City; for expenses of the California Debris Commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act approved March 1, 1893 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 661); for such works, hereby authorized, as may be necessary for the protection of the town of Collinsville, Ala.; for removing sunken vessels or craft obstructing or endangering navigation as authorized by law; for operating and maintaining, keeping in repair, and continuing in use without interruption any lock, canal (except the Panama Canal), canalized river, or other public works for the use and benefit of navigation belonging to the United States; for payment annually of tuition fees of not to exceed 35 student officers of the Corps of Engineers at civil technical institutions under the provisions of section 127a of the National Defense Act, as amended (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 535); for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors; and for printing, including illustrations, as may be authorized by the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, either during a recess or session of Congress, of surveys authorized by law, and such surveys as may be printed during a recess of Congress shall be printed, with illustrations, as documents of the next succeeding session of Congress, and for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motorboats, for official use, not to exceed $197,971: Provided, That no funds shall be expended for any preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate not authorized by law, $128,000,000: Provided further, That from this appropriation the Secretary of War may, in his discretion and on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers based on the recommendation by the Board for Rivers and Harbors in the review of a report or reports authorized by law, expend such sums as may be necessary for the maintenance of harbor channels provided by a State, municipality, or other public agency, outside of harbor lines and serving essential needs of general commerce and navigation, such work to be subject to the conditions recommended by the Chief of Engineers in his report or reports thereon: Provided further, That no appropriation under the Corps of Engineers for the fiscal year 1938 shall be available for any expenses incident to operating any power-driven boat or vessel on other than Government business: Provided further, That not to exceed $3,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available for the support and maintenance of the Permanent International Commission of the Congresses of Navigation and for the payment of the actual expenses of the properly accredited delegates of the United States to the meeting of the congresses and of the commission.

FLOOD CONTROL

Flood control: For the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes, in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act, approved June 22, 1936 (49 Stat. 1570–1595), including printing and binding and office supplies and equipment required in the office of the Chief of Engineers to carry out the purposes of this act, the purchase (not to exceed $47,250) of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motorboats for official use, and not to exceed $500,000 for preliminary examinations and surveys of flood-control projects authorized by law, $60,000,000: Provided, That $500,000 of this appropriation shall be transferred and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for preliminary examinations and surveys for run-off and water-flow retardation and soil-erosion prevention on the watersheds of flood-control projects authorized by law, including the employment of persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books and periodicals, printing and binding, rent in the District of Columbia, the purchase (not to exceed $30,000) of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motorboats, and for other necessary expenses: Provided further, That the Chief of Engineers, when authorized by the Secretary of War, may enter into construction contracts prior to July 1, 1938, to an amount not in excess of $38,000,000, in addition to the sum herein appropriated, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government payable after the next regular annual appropriation becomes available: And provided further, That if any funds are made available for the above purposes from the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1937, the appropriation herein made shall be reduced by an amount equal to the sum so made available, but this proviso shall not operate to reduce this appropriation below $30,000,000.

Flood control, Mississippi River and tributaries: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act, approved May 15, 1928 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 702a), as amended by the Flood Control Act approved June 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1508), and for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motorboats, for official use, not to exceed $56,300, $45,000,000: Provided, That the Chief of Engineers, when authorized by the Secretary of War, may enter into construction contracts prior to July 1, 1938, to an amount not in excess of $10,000,000, in addition to the sum herein appropriated, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government payable after the next regular annual appropriation becomes available: Provided further, That if any funds are made available for the above purposes from the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1937, the appropriation herein made shall be reduced by an amount equal to the sum so made available, but this proviso shall not operate to reduce this appropriation below $22,500,000.

Emergency fund for flood control on tributaries of Mississippi River: For rescue work and for repair or maintenance of any flood-control work on any tributaries of the Mississippi River threatened or destroyed by flood, in accordance with section 9 of the Flood Control Act, approved June 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1508), $100,000.

Flood control, Sacramento River, Calif.: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act approved March 1, 1917 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 703), as modified by the Flood Control Act approved May 15, 1928 (U. S. C., title 33, sec. 704), including not to exceed $2,600 for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motorboats, for official use, $814,500.

Flood control, Lowel Creek, Alaska: For maintenance of flood-control works in accordance with the act approved February 14, 1933 (47 Stat., p. 802), $1,000.

Flood control, Salmon River, Alaska: For maintenance repairs to dikes in the flood-control works at the town of Hyder, Alaska, as authorized by the act approved June 18, 1934 (48 Stat., p. 991), $800.

UNITED STATES SOLDIERS' HOME

For maintenance and operation of the United States Soldiers' Home, including maintenance, repair, and operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled freight- and passenger-carrying vehicles and the purchase of one motor-propelled vehicle of the station-wagon type at a cost not to exceed $1,000, including the value of a vehicle exchanged, to be paid from the Soldiers' Home Permanent Fund, $804,456: Provided, That notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the administration, control, procurement, expenditure, accounting, audit, and methods thereof, of funds appropriated from the Soldiers' Home Permanent Fund (trust fund) shall be according to the laws governing and in effect prior to July 1, 1935, relating specifically to the United States Soldiers' Home, and in accordance with procedure followed prior to such date: Provided further, That not to exceed five retired officers of the Regular Army may be assigned to active duty at the United States Soldiers' Home, and such officers while so assigned shall be entitled, notwithstanding any other provisions of law, to the pay and allowances of officers of the same rank and length of service on the active list of the Army: Provided further, That, effective July 1, 1937, the Board of Commissioners of the Home may prescribe the duties to be performed and fix the compensation to be paid for personal services rendered by hospital orderlies and member employees of the Home without regard to the provisions of the Classification Act, 1923, as amended, or any other law relating to payment for personal services.

THE PANAMA CANAL

The limitations on the expenditure of appropriations hereinbefore made in this act shall not apply to the appropriations for the Panama Canal.

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the maintenance and operation, sanitation, and civil government of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone, including the following: Compensation of all officials and employees; foreign and domestic newspapers and periodicals; lawbooks not exceeding $1,000; textbooks and books of reference; printing and binding, including printing of annual report; rent and personal services in the District of Columbia; purchase or exchange of typewriting, adding, and other machines; purchase or exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles; claims for damages to vessels passing through the locks of the Panama Canal, as authorized by the Panama Canal Act; claims for losses of or damages to property arising from the conduct of authorized business operations; claims for damages to property arising from the maintenance and operation, sanitation, and civil government of the Panama Canal; acquisition of land and land under water, as authorized in the Panama Canal Act; expenses incurred in assembling, assorting, storing, repairing, and selling material, machinery, and equipment heretofore or hereafter purchased or acquired for the construction of the Panama Canal which are unserviceable or no longer needed, to be reimbursed from the proceeds of such sale; expenses incident to conducting hearings and examining estimates for appropriations on the Isthmus; expenses incident to any emergency arising because of calamity by flood, fire, pestilence, or like character not foreseen or otherwise provided for herein; traveling expenses, when prescribed by the Governor of the Panama Canal to persons engaged in field work or traveling on official business; transportation, including insurance, of public funds and securities between the United States and the Canal Zone; and for such other expenses not in the United States as the Governor of the Panama Canal may deem necessary best to promote the maintenance and operation, sanitation, and civil government of the Panama Canal, all to be expended under the direction of the Governor of the Panama Canal and accounted for as follows:

For maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal: Salary of the Governor, $10,000; purchase, inspection, delivery, handling, and storing of materials, supplies, and equipment for issue to all departments of the Panama Canal, the Panama Railroad, other branches of the United States Government, and for authorized sales; payment in lump sums of not exceeding the amounts authorized by the Injury Compensation Act approved September 7, 1916 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 793), to alien cripples who are now a charge upon the Panama Canal by reason of injuries sustained while employed in the construction of the Panama Canal; in all, $8,519,000, together with all moneys arising from the conduct of business operations authorized by the Panama Canal Act.

For sanitation, quarantine, hospitals, and medical aid and support of the insane and of lepers and aid and support of indigent persons legally within the Canal Zone, including expenses of their deportation when practicable, and the purchase of artificial limbs or other appliances for persons who were injured in the service of the Isthmian Canal Commission or the Panama Canal prior to September 7, 1916, and including additional compensation to any officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed with the Panama Canal as chief quarantine officer, $918,000.

For civil government of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone, including gratuities and necessary clothing for indigent discharged prisoners, $1,131,760.

Total, Panama Canal, $10,568,760, to be available until expended.

In addition to the foregoing sums there is appropriated for the fiscal year 1938 for expenditures and reinvestment under the several heads of appropriation aforesaid, without being covered into the Treasury of the United States, all moneys received by the Panama Canal from services rendered or materials and supplies furnished to the United States, the Panama Railroad Co., the Canal Zone government, or to their employees, respectively, or to the Panama Government, from hotel and hospital supplies and services; from rentals, wharfage, and like service; from labor, materials, and supplies and other services furnished to vessels other than those passing through the Canal, and to others unable to obtain the same elsewhere; from the sale of scrap and other by-products of manufacturing and shop operations; from the sale of obsolete and unserviceable materials, supplies, and equipment purchased or acquired for the operation, maintenance, protection, sanitation, and government of the Canal and Canal Zone; and any net profits accruing from such business to the Panama Canal shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

In addition, there is appropriated for the operation, maintenance, and extension of waterworks, sewers, and pavements in the cities of Panama and Colon, during the fiscal year 1938, the necessary portions of such sums as shall be paid as water rentals or directly by the Government of Panama for such expenses.

Memorial to Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals: For necessary expenses incident to the selection of the site, and preparation of plans and estimates of cost, for the erection of a memorial to Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals within the Canal Zone, authorized by the act approved August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 743), including travel expenses of the members of the Goethals Memorial Commission appointed by the President under authority of said act, and of the employees of said Commission; employment of an architect or architects without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment or compensation of officers and employees of the United States; stationery and supplies; and all other necessary expenses, $5,000, to be available immediately and also for payment of expenses heretofore incurred in carrying out the purposes of such act of August 24, 1935.

SEC. 2. Three million dollars of the appropriation "Capital stock, Inland Waterways Corporation" are hereby repealed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ought to say at this point that this year the House undertook to divide the War Department bill into two parts, one of the military character and the other of a nonmilitary character, so that the casual student might not be deceived as to what part was for possible war and what part was for civil activities.

I think perhaps on general principles that may be a good plan; but, unfortunately, the surgery was not well performed. We find that the Army engineers' salaries and the civil engineers' salaries, and certain items for the High Commission in the Philippines, and so forth, were not deducted; likewise, the supplies of the Army engineers, their travel allowances, and so forth. Perhaps in another year it may be done.

In the meantime, we had had our hearings. There were necessary delays in the House, so that we did not get to the second bill. So we proceeded, as the bill indicates, and added the nonmilitary activities as an amendment to the regular bill.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, in the light of the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and the events of the past few weeks, I wish to make a few remarks.

Members of the Senate are familiar with the fact that a few weeks ago the Spanish ship España was sunk off the coast of Spain by an aerial bomber. The Members of the Senate also are familiar with the fact that a few weeks ago a group of Russian flyers landed at the North Pole and established a base of operations at the North Pole, and that within the past week a Russian plane starting from Russia, going over the North Pole on a trip the destination of which was San Francisco, landed in the city of Vancouver, in the State of Washington.

I think these events have demonstrated the fact that it is possible, through the use of military bombers and through the use of large planes, to create an effective weapon of defense. The old type of Army bomber was a pretty ineffectual instrument; but in the year 1935, acting under plans of the War Department, the Boeing Airplane Co., located in the city of Seattle, State of Washington, developed a bombardment airplane, type Y–B–17. It is a large four-engine plane. Eight of these planes have been manufactured for the Government and are under test at the present time. The tests that have been made by the Army air force have been eminently satisfactory.

I call this matter to the attention of the Senate because of my belief that through the use of the large bombing plane it is going to be possible for this Government very materially to reduce its necessary military and naval expenditures.

We are told by those interested in military and naval affairs that our Army and Navy are purely for purposes of defense. Assuming that to be true, with planes of the type which are being produced under these plans it will be possible, by the maintenance of a comparatively small number of places within the United States and the Territories of the United States, to develop a defensive weapon which will make unnecessary many of our present expenditures for the Army and the Navy.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. In addition to the very pertinent discussion of the Senator from Washington with regard to the probable developments and changes in warfare by reason of the demonstrations of the Russian aviators, possibly either making many of the mobile military defenses unnecessary or requiring them to be of a different character, the Senator will recall that very recently an aviator flying on behalf of the Spanish loyalist government probably brought about in the near future a great change in naval warfare by sinking from a bombing plane a first-line battleship—an event which will probably render much of the naval construction to be done in the next couple of years by the United States and other nations of the world in the way of battleships obsolete before the ships are even constructed.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I may say, in reference to what the Senator from Missouri has stated, that it is interesting to note that within the same day when that battleship was sunk our Navy Department, through its publicity office, made the announcement that the battleship was simply an old one and of an obsolete type.

If it is possible for a plane to sink an old battleship, I have not been able to see that the fact that it is old has anything to do with the effectiveness of the bombing plane.

Mr. CLARK. And if a bomb were dropped down the funnel of one of the new battleships to be constructed, it would probably have the same effect on that ship the bomb had on the old battleship.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The reason why the use of these larger planes will be effective is the cruising range which they have. They have a cruising range of 1,500 miles. The original plane, which was built in 1935, left Seattle, went to Dayton, Ohio, a distance of 2,000 miles, and reached Dayton in a period of 9 hours. It is possible through the use of such planes, by establishing one base in Alaska, a base in the Pacific Northwest, a base in California, one at Honolulu, one at the Panama Canal, one at Miami, Fla., and one in the vicinity of Washington, D. C., to completely cover the area which the United States desires to protect. Heretofore small planes, single-engine planes or two-engine planes, have had such a limited cruising range that they were simply of use to the mobile forces.

In the bill before us there is a large appropriation for the purchase of new airplanes. I understand it is contemplated that we shall purchase more of the bombing type of plane. Since it has been demonstrated that it is possible for planes to travel the distances they can travel effectively, since it is possible by the use of the larger four-engine bombers to have planes with a cruising range of 1,500 miles, it will be possible, under a program of that kind, to reduce the number of places where we would establish air bases for the bombing planes to the small number I have described, and still completely cover the area which we feel we must defend.

I sincerely hope the War Department and the General Staff will give proper attention to the possibility of the development of this type of airplane, and that as a result it will be possible in the near future to bring about a reduction in our necessary military appropriations.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say that in formulating the amendment we have now reached we followed the progress of the bill in the House, and, so far as we could, closely approximated the bill. The chief difference lies in the appropriation for flood control.

Mr. President, would it be in order now for us to perfect the amendment we have before us?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be proper.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to call attention to an item under rivers and harbors on page 71, lines 22 and 23. I ask that those lines be stricken out. The reason is that this project has never been surveyed, it has never been approved by the Army engineers, it has never been approved by the Congress. Therefore it has no place in this bill under our rules.

I ask that on page 71, lines 22 and 23, there be stricken out the words "for such works, hereby authorized, as may be necessary for the protection of the town of Collinsville, Ala."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on page 75, at the bottom of the page, beginning in line 21, will be found an emergency fund for flood control on the tributaries of the Mississippi River, for rescue work, for repair, and so forth. Since this language was inserted in the bill an estimate has come from the Budget Bureau, with the approval of the President, with a request that the sum at the end of line 26 be changed to $300,000 instead of $100,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 75, line 26, it is proposed to strike out "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$300,000", so as to make the paragraph read:

> Emergency fund for flood control on tributaries of Mississippi River: For rescue work and for repair or maintenance of any flood-control work on any tributaries of the Mississippi River threatened or destroyed by flood, in accordance with section 9 of the Flood Control Act, approved June 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1508), $300,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, I am interested in the whole subject of flood control. I note that in the Senate committee amendment, which is supposed to incorporate the so-called nonmilitary or flood-control provisions of the bill which I believe has passed or is under consideration in the House, the committee provides $60,000,000 for flood-control projects authorized under the act of 1936.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator defer his suggestion on that for just a moment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I call attention to page 77, the proviso on line 13, running to the end of line 20. That is a repetition of language found in an earlier part of the bill and I ask that the proviso at this point be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 77, line 13, after the word "Army" and the colon, it is proposed to strike out the following proviso:

> Provided further, That, effective July 1, 1937, the board of commissioners of the home may prescribe the duties to be performed and fix the compensation to be paid for personal services rendered by hospital orderlies and member employees of the home without regard to the provisions of the Classification Act, 1923, as amended, or any other law relating to payment for personal services.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I was interested to know whether I had properly interpreted the language of the bill on pages 74 and 75. On page 74 the committee recommends the appropriation of $60,000,000 to begin the construction of certain flood-control projects authorized in the act of 1936, and also authorizes the Chief of Engineers to enter into contracts prior to July 1, 1938, up to the amount of $38,000,000. So that the committee is authorizing the expenditure and the contracting of an amount equal to $98,000,000 under the act of 1936.

The committee provides that if the President shall, out of the relief funds, allocate any amount to that work under the act of 1936, this appropriation shall be reduced by whatever amount the President allocates, provided this appropriation shall not be less than $30,000,000.

In other words, if the President should allocate $30,000,000, then the total amount to be expended would be $60,000,000—$30,000,000 out of this appropriation and $30,000,000 out of his allocation. If he allocated more than $30,000,000, then the amount available for next year would be $60,000,000 plus whatever more than $30,000,000 he allocated in addition to the $38,000,000 that might be contracted for.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that clears up the matter so far as the act of 1936 is concerned.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator that the discussion on the floor of the House made it quite clear, in the words of Mr. RAYBURN, that in all probability the President would allocate $11,000,000 more than the $30,000,000 which we speak of to cover certain unauthorized projects, particularly at Paducah and some other points in Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. That probably is not under the appropriation of the $60,000,000. That comes in on page 75, where provision is made for flood control on the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Forty-five million dollars is appropriated there, and authority is given for additional contracts in an amount not in excess of $10,000,000; and the same provision is made as to any allocation out of relief funds, with the exception that the minimum appropriation, no matter how much the President may allocate, is twenty-two and one-half million dollars.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to inquire of the Senator what information he has to the probable amount. No one, of course, can commit the President on that subject, and no one would attempt to do so; but if the Senator has any information as to the probable amount that is running in the mind of the President, or if anybody knows what he probably will do in that regard, I should like to have the Senator state it, if it is not confidential information.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no confidential information. Mr. RAYBURN in the House made certain statements. I should think the Senator who addressed the question to me perhaps would be better qualified to answer the question than I am.

Mr. BARKLEY. Far from it.

Mr. COPELAND. As I understood Mr. RAYBURN's statement, it was to this effect: In view of the floods in the Ohio and Mississippi River Basins quite a large sum of money was earmarked for flood control, and Mr. RAYBURN stated that he had no doubt that the amount which would be allocated for emergency relief would be at least $30,000,000 for the so-called Copeland bill, and twenty-two and one-half million dollars for the Overton bill, and then eleven or twelve million dollars for unauthorized projects.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; projects made necessary by reason of the recent floods.

Mr. COPELAND. Projects made necessary by reason of the experience of the recent floods.

Mr. BARKLEY. And none of which is authorized, and none of which may be authorized by the acts passed at this session.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. So, if all of that should happen, there would be not less than $60,000,000 to spend under the Copeland Act, and not less than $45,000,000 under the Overton Act, with possibly $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 for projects unauthorized in either act, growing out of the recent floods in the Ohio Valley.

Mr. COPELAND. And in addition to what the Senator has said, the contractual obligation under the Copeland Act of $38,000,000, and $10,000,000 under the Overton Act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what his construction of this language would be with regard to the particular situation which has arisen as the result of the flood of this year.

The Senator will recall that the so-called Bird's Point-New Madrid spillway was originally constructed for the protection of Cairo, Ill., not for the protection of any of the people on the Missouri side of the river. The understanding was that it was to be a fuse-plug levee, which would automatically be blown when it had reached a certain point, and therefore the act authorized only the acquisition of flowage rights by the United States Government. Under the contention made by the Corps of Engineers, the damages to these flowage rights were held down to the absolute minimum.

In the tremendous floods of this year, not only for the protection of Cairo, Ill., but for the protection of the lower river, the Army engineers did not wait for the situation to occur which had been contemplated, that the levee should automatically go out, but ordered the dynamiting of the levee, and inundated the whole territory, and drove the people out of their homes. Shortly thereafter there was a recurrence of the flood in the Ohio Valley, and the Army engineers again ordered the people out of their homes after they had come back and had just begun to plant their crops.

In line with the recommendations of the Army engineers contained in the bill pending in the House as to future projects of that sort, it seems that it should be the policy of the Government in future cases to acquire this land in fee; but, in view of the fact that the lands have already been practically ruined, would this provision for projects not specifically authorized cover the acquisition in fee of lands in the Bird's Point-New Madrid Spillway? I may say that it is my purpose to offer a substantive amendment to that effect when the bill comes over from the House.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the man best qualified to answer that question is the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON]. I will say, in justice to the committee, that the matter was very thoroughly discussed in the committee. While I do not always believe everything I read in the newspapers, there was a statement in the press to the effect that the President gave the impression to the newspaper men that this land should be acquired in fee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the reference was in the report of the Chief of Engineers, as I recall, to the House committee. That had to do with the Morganza and Eudora spillways, and these other settlements on the lower river. But in those cases the people have already been driven out of their homes by the action of the Army engineers, undoubtedly in the public welfare, but in absolute contravention of the terms by which the flowage rights were acquired; and it seems only just that the Government should purchase those lands in fee.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, there is another question involved there which the Senator from Louisiana will discuss, and that is the effect upon the State of Louisiana and its various parishes if all that land is taken off the tax list.

A very dramatic thing happened in connection with the flood at Cairo. The Army engineers made every effort to evacuate the territory in the flood area, but it could not do so in time to make certain that all the residents were out; and even though they were under the impression that there were 200 persons left in the possibly flooded area, they felt it wise to dynamite the levees and let the water in.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, the point is that they had no authority whatever to dynamite the levee. The levee, under the law, was constructed for the purpose of being a fuse plug which would go out automatically when the river had reached a certain point. I make no criticism of the course the Army engineers pursued, but the Army engineers did not wait for the situation contemplated by law to arise. They proceeded to dynamite the levee. Unfortunately, several persons were drowned.

I am not now discussing whether any responsibility can be laid at the doors of the Army engineers for the lives being lost. What I am saying is that under the policy pursued by the Army engineers under the authority of the Government, an entirely different situation has arisen as to the use made of the land by the Government.

Mr. COPELAND. I am going to ask the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] to take up the discussion of the subject in detail.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Am I correct in my assumption that the flood-control section, beginning on page 73 of the bill, which makes provision for the appropriation of $60,000,000 and $38,000,000, takes in the flood-control work in the Merrimack and Connecticut River Basins?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to say that it does. The project in this division of the bill, if it shall be adopted by the Congress, will take care of the reservoirs in the Merrimack River Basin, the reservoirs in the Connecticut River Basin in Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut; will take care of reservoirs and channel enlargements in southern New York and eastern Pennsylvania, the Susquehanna Basin levees for protection of Williamsport, Pa., the Potomac River Basin levees for protection of cities, the Tar River channel clearing, the Savannah River levee at Augusta, Ga., the Mobile River Basin, Buffalo River, Miss., Red River Basin, Ouachita River Basin, Arkansas River Basin, White River Basin, upper Mississippi and Illinois Rivers, reservoir system for the protection of Pittsburgh, Wabash River, Cumberland River, Kansas River Basin, Cheyenne, Yellowstone, and Milk Rivers, Los Angeles and San Gabriel Rivers, Santa Ana River, Columbia River Basin, Willamette River, Puyallup River, Umatilla River, Lewis River, Stilaguamish River, Cowlitz River, and various surveys.

I have purposely read the list, because I thought someone else might ask a question relating to some river or projects involved. It does take care of the projects to which the Senator from Massachusetts has referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator referred to the upper Mississippi. Where does that begin in accordance with the Senator's understanding?

Mr. COPELAND. I suppose it begins at Cairo.

Mr. McKELLAR. What about the Mississippi River below Cairo?

Mr. COPELAND. That is all taken care of in the other bill which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] will discuss.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I do not have before me a copy of the flood-control bill of last year. The bill now before us does not carry definite allocations of money for the projects which the engineers mention in their testimony, and the text of the bill is not an appropriation or allocation of money. What is there in the wording of the law itself that will require the engineers to do the things which they discussed in their testimony?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator will find, in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, with reference to the War Department appropriation bill, a list of the projects which will be carried on if $98,000,000 is made available. Those projects will be found on pages 197 and 198 of the Senate committee hearings.

The lower Mississippi begins at Cairo, I may say to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BONE. As I said, I do not have last year's flood-control bill before me. I have forgotten whether it contains a provision that the engineers themselves shall lay out the projects as they determine upon their advisability and feasibility, and that they shall have authority to spend the money as indicated on page 198 of the committee hearings to which the Senator has just called my attention.

Mr. COPELAND. Under the law the President has the final say about it; but the projects will be carried out exactly in harmony with the list I read a moment ago. We discussed that matter, as the Senator will find if he will read the hearings. During the next year projects to the amount of $60,000,000 will be completed and other projects to the amount of $38,000,000 will be begun. Of course, the determination of priority will be made by the Army engineers, I suppose, upon consultation with the President.

Mr. BONE. Assuming $60,000,000 is appropriated in this bill, is it also a fair assumption that the projects listed on page 198 of the committee hearings will be undertaken within the fiscal year?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BONE. I have referred to this because the list contains the names of four rivers in Washington.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. The Senator will observe that had we not taken the course we have taken, and unless the Congress should appropriate the money, the projects on these rivers would not be undertaken this year.

Mr. BONE. The only one contemplated for first-year development is Puyallup.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; but if the bill passes in its present form, everything contemplated for the first and second years, as set forth in the first two columns, will be undertaken at once.

Mr. BONE. That is to say, if $60,000,000 is carried in the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator has just given the information I wanted. Some of the items in the column marked "second year" have no corresponding sum in the first year, so that, regardless of that, they would be begun during the first year under the $60,000,000 appropriation. Is that correct?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. Under this appropriation as planned, everything in the first and second years will be begun.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, in reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] as to the acquisition in fee simple of lands in floodways, I may say that the Overton Act does not provide or contemplate that any of the land shall be acquired in fee simple.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I am perfectly aware of that. I understand that under the Jadwin Act the language was construed in a very different way than was contemplated when the act was passed. That is the point I was making.

Mr. OVERTON. It is my understanding that neither under the act of May 15, 1928, referred to as the Jadwin Act, nor under the Overton Act, is it contemplated that the land in the Birds Point floodway shall be acquired in fee simple.

Mr. CLARK. I had no idea that the act provided that it should be acquired in fee simple. The act specifically provided that it should be acquired for use in a particular way. The land has been used in a very different way and the suggestion is made that in justice to the owners of the land the Congress should provide that the land shall be acquired in fee simple.

Mr. OVERTON. It is possible that the position taken by the Senator from Missouri may be correct, but, in order to accomplish that purpose, there would have to be legislation and the act of May 15, 1928, would have to be amended or some independent bill would have to be enacted into law providing for the acquisition, in fee simple, of the lands in the Bird's Point-New Madrid floodway. As the law now stands, there is no authority vested in the Secretary of War or the Chief of Army Engineers to acquire any of the land in fee simple in the Bird's Point-New Madrid floodway.

The appropriation bill now before us does not contemplate that any of the sums appropriated shall be used for the acquisition of any of those lands in any of the floodways under either the act of May 15, 1928, or the act of June 15, 1936, or that they shall be acquired in fee simple.

It is simply an appropriation to carry into execution the existing law, and that would be to acquire flowage easements in the Eudora floodway, in the West Atchafalaya floodway and in the floodway east of the Atchafalaya River known as the Morganza floodway.

I shall be very glad to answer any questions in reference to this appropriation that the Senator may address to me, or to furnish any information I can supply regarding it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I take it the Senator from Louisiana would consider it a misfortune if, at this stage of the negotiations, any effort were actually made to acquire a fee-simple title.

Mr. OVERTON. It would indeed be very unfortunate.

Mr. COPELAND. I think so.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERTON. Before I yield further, let me say, in answer to the Senator from New York, that the floodways contemplated in southeastern Arkansas and in Louisiana embrace, in round figures, about a million acres of land. The Eudora floodway, starting in southeastern Arkansas, has a width of approximately 10 miles, and has a length of approximately 100 miles. Starting in southeastern Arkansas, it runs down through Louisiana into the Red River backwater area. If the Government should acquire the ownership of the eight-hundred-and-some-odd thousand acres embraced in the Eudora floodway alone, all that property would be taken off the assessment rolls, and would not be subject to State taxation or to local taxation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Much of the land is in a very high state of cultivation, and if the Government should acquire the land it would be difficult to conceive what use the Government could make of it other than for flood purposes. It is expected that these lands will continue to be cultivated; in fact, the greater portions of them have been cultivated for many, many years, and they can be cultivated in the future. Even after the establishment of this floodway, there will be periods and years when the lands will not be valuable for crop raising by reason of the floods; but in other years, when the floods do not come, they may still be used by their owners as they are now used.

I agree with the Senator from Louisiana that it would be impracticable, and would raise a new and very large issue, to provide now for the acquisition of titles in fee simple. The proposal is to acquire easements or flowage rights; and, of course, that represents a very material difference in value from that which would be involved if the fee-simple title were to pass to the Government.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Arkansas, I believe, happened to be out of the Chamber when the matter was brought up. The point I was raising had nothing to do with the flowage rights of the lower spillways but was confined entirely to the so-called Birds Point-New Madrid spillway, which was not created by the Government for the protection of the lands contained in the spillway, or even in the vicinity of the spillway. It was constructed by the Government for the protection of Cairo, Ill., on the other side of the river, and the lower river. The contemplation of the act was that that was to be a "fuse plug" levee which was only to be put in operation when the river reached a certain height, and then the fuse plug would necessarily go out.

In view of the unprecedented flood in the Ohio Valley this year, the Government engineers did not wait for the "fuse plug" point to be reached. They did not wait to see whether, under the terms contemplated in the act, it was necessary. They dynamited the levee. A number of persons in the area covered by the spillway lost their lives. Their property was almost completely devastated. Then a few weeks later, when the survivors were going back there and endeavoring to rehabilitate their land, a secondary flood came down the Ohio Valley, still having nothing to do with the people connected with that spillway, and the Army engineers again ordered them out of their homes.

If the spillway is to be put to that extraordinary use, I say the Government ought to acquire it in fee simple, instead of acquiring in the courts of the country at a very low rate flowage rights for an entirely different situation.

I realize that a provision of this sort is subject to a point of order on the pending bill, and I merely injected the question in connection with the discussion of the problematic development of the flood situation. I propose to offer an amendment on the subject to the very first bill that comes over from the House having to do with flood control. This seems to me to be an extraordinary situation, but one in which the Government, while possibly acting in the general public interest, certainly has done a very grave injustice to the people having homes in the spillway.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Missouri, and some facts which I learned from press reports during the flood, I think this is a subject which may very well receive consideration. I do not understand that the Senator from Missouri contemplates offering an amendment to this bill, however.

Mr. CLARK. No; I am aware that such an amendment would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I realize that there is quite a difference between the Bird's Point-New Madrid floodway, so-called, and such a floodway as the Eudora floodway. The Bird's Point-New Madrid floodway is simply a little detour where the water is taken from the Mississippi River, as the Senator from Missouri has well said, in order to relieve the situation at Cairo; and, after being taken from the river, a few miles farther down it empties back into the Mississippi River. The floodway is intended for temporary relief and for local relief, and does not affect, to any extent, the stage of the Mississippi River either above or below it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana about the flood-control provision of the bill on page 75, relating to the Mississippi River and its tributaries. Of course, this is merely an appropriation to carry on the authorization in existing law, as I understand, within the Mississippi River tributaries.

Mr. OVERTON. That is all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does it include the Red River and the Arkansas River?

Mr. OVERTON. No; it does not, except up to a certain point. On the south bank of the Arkansas, the levee comes within the provisions of what might be called the lower Mississippi River Valley or flood-control legislation. Those tributaries come under the lower Mississippi Valley legislation only insofar as the Mississippi River itself affects those tributaries. The legislation does not go to the upper reaches of the Arkansas, nor to those of the Red.

Mr. CONNALLY. It would not refer in any wise, then, to the proposed dam on the Red River near Denison, Tex.?

Mr. OVERTON. No; that would come more properly under the omnibus flood-control bill, if approved. The dams and reservoirs on the upper tributaries were taken care of under the Copeland bill. The Overton Flood Control Act relates to the Mississippi Valley proper, and to those portions of the tributaries in the lower reaches that are directly influenced by the Mississippi waters.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is a provision in this committee amendment repealing the authorization of a portion of the capitalization of the Inland Waterways Corporation. Will the Senator state the justification for that provision? Section 2 on page 82 reads:

Three million dollars of the appropriation, "Capital stock, Inland Waterways Corporations", are hereby repealed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the story about that, as I understand, is this: The Inland Waterways Corporation have a larger reserve than they need, and this is to give them authority to get rid of it. The provision has no relationship to building the new ships, which are to be constructed out of other funds.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee known as title II, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 4. This act may be cited as the Military Appropriation Act, 1938.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I offer and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 74, after line 26, it is proposed to insert the following:

The act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved June 22, 1936, is hereby amended by adding to the first paragraph of section 5 a proviso reading as follows: "Provided further, That the Secretary of War is authorized to receive from States or political subdivisions thereof, such funds as may be contributed by them to be expended in connection with funds appropriated by the United States for any authorized flood-control work whenever such work and expenditure may be considered by the Secretary of War, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, as advantageous in the public interest, and the plans for any reservoir project may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, be modified to provide additional storage capacity for domestic water supply or other conservation storage, on condition that the cost of such increased storage capacity is contributed by local agencies and that the local agencies agree to utilize such additional storage capacity in a manner consistent with Federal uses and purposes: And provided further, That when contributions made by States, or political subdivisions thereof, are in excess of the actual cost of the work contemplated and properly chargeable to such contributions, such excess contributions may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, be returned to the proper representatives of the contributing interests."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the significance of that amendment is, as follows, to give a specific example:

The city of Oklahoma City desires to take advantage of what the Goverment is doing in the way of building a flood-control reservoir above the city.

It desires to contribute $2,000,000 in order to increase the height of the dam, and then make use of the additional water in the mill pond for purposes of supplying the city with potable water. The Army engineers stated to us that there are some other similar instances. Of course, there is no added expense to the Federal Government, and there is no loss of efficiency by reason of the development of the project; but the project is enlarged in order that the surplus water may be used, and I think the amendment should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send forward two amendments, which ought not to be necessary because we have passed in the Senate legislation covering both matters, but we did not have the language at the time the bill was written, and therefore I ask that the bill be amended by the insertion of the language which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the first amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 16, line 4, after the word "Department", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the appropriation "Travel of the Army" current at the date of relief from duty station of personnel traveling under orders shall be charged with all expenses properly chargeable to such appropriation in connection with the travel enjoined, including travel expenses of dependents, regardless of the dates of arrival at destination of the persons so traveling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the second amendment sent forward by the Senator from New York.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 10, line 18, after the numerals "$34,843,745", to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That on and after July 1, 1937, there shall be authorized 1,083 officers of the Medical Corps and 208 officers of the Dental Corps, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of June 30, 1922 (42 Stat. 721), and the authorized commissioned strength of the Army is hereby increased by 75 in order to provide for the increase herein authorized in the number of officers in the Medical Corps and the Dental Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that the clerks be authorized to correct the totals in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the title be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator that that motion will properly come after the passage of the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 63, line 20, after the words "Officers' Training Corps", it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for or toward the support of any compulsory military course or military training in any civil school or college, or for the pay of any officer, enlisted man, or employee of any civil school or college which suspends, expels, or otherwise penalizes students who, because of conscientious convictions or because of religious beliefs, object to enrollment in a course in military training; but nothing herein shall be construed as applying to essentially military schools or colleges.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment? The Senator from Mississippi wishes to ask a question.

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. BILBO. I desire to ask the Senator from New York a question about the sums designated in the bill for rivers and harbors and other projects. I am keenly interested in knowing just how this amount was arrived at because I am interested in some authorizations affecting my State contained in the bill passed in 1936.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that he can thank God and take courage, because there is an appropriation of $131,000 for the Tombigbee River, an appropriation for the Yazoo River, as well as appropriations for the Tallahatchie and the Big Sunflower Rivers. Besides that, the Army engineers have made a favorable report to the House on Pearl River. General Pillsbury has promised that in the work of this year the Pearl River project will be undertaken.

I may say to the Senator from North Dakota that unless he cares to go on we are willing to go over now until tomorrow. It is wholly in his hands.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I would rather have a recess until tomorrow. It is now a quarter past 5, and I should like to speak for 15 or 20 minutes on the amendment I have offered, and I assume others will also desire to discuss the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I leave it in the hands of the leader on this side.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is this the last amendment to be offered, so far as the Senator in charge of the bill knows?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; it is, so far as I know.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I expect to offer.

Mr. HARRISON. About how long will it take? There is a joint resolution extending certain taxes which must be passed at a very early date. I had hoped that the pending bill would be out of the way in 2 or 3 hours, as I had been informed it would be, and I was wondering about how long the pending amendment would take tomorrow before we could proceed with the other matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have but recently read the draft of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. It is my impression that it is controversial, and, of course, I cannot say who else may desire to discuss it, but I must give notice that I shall discuss it. It is a matter which will probably take an hour, unless general discussion ensues.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that perhaps the Senate had better take a recess until tomorrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall raise no objection, except that if the debate is to be prolonged I shall have to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to consent to it being set aside so as to take up the measure I have suggested.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am satisfied consideration of the bill will be concluded within a comparatively short time. All amendments, except possibly that of the Senator from North Dakota and the amendment which the Senator from Louisiana will propose, have been acted upon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Mississippi that he intends to ask that the joint resolution extending the excise taxes be taken up, and in view of the further fact that I intend to offer certain amendments to the joint resolution proposing to increase the individual income-tax rates, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a table which may be of some help in discussing my amendment tomorrow. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD so that Senators may readily refer to it.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Income tax, individual—Comparison of total tax payable on specimen net income by a married person without dependents and entitled to the maximum earned-income allowance under existing United States and British laws and La Follette plans

PAYMENT TO SIOUX INDIANS OF THE PINE RIDGE RESERVATION

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate passed Senate bill 2556, to authorize an appropriation to carry out the provisions of the act of May 3, 1928. The bill was introduced by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW]. It went to the House, and at a later date the House passed an identical bill, House bill 7328. In order to simplify the RECORD, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7328.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7328) to authorize an appropriation to carry out the provisions of the act of May 3, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 484), and for other purposes, which was read the first time by title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation is hereby authorized in the sum of $79,038 to pay various Sioux Indians of the Pine Ridge Reservation, S. Dak., the amounts which have been awarded to them by the Secretary of the Interior under the act of May 3, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 484), on account of allotments of land to which they were entitled but did not receive: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to determine what attorney or attorneys have rendered services of value in behalf of said Indians and to pay such attorney or attorneys on such findings when appropriation is available the reasonable value of their services, not to exceed 10 percent of the recovery on each individual claim, which payment shall be in full settlement for all services rendered by the attorney or attorneys to the claimants in such claim.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 102) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Antietam, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 22, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Simpson B. Daugherty, D. D., National Memorial United Brethren Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our gracious Father-God, we approach Thee in humility and contrition to thank Thee for another day which marks a new beginning of life, for we realize that each day the world is made anew. We adore Thee for Thy presence. Thou dost ever stand amid the shadows keeping watch above Thine own.

Give wisdom and understanding to these Thy children who have upon their hearts the best interests and welfare of our Nation. May they have light and guidance from above. Give us sympathetic discernment of their desire to do that which shall be pleasing in Thy sight. May this session of our Congress light the torch that shall guide us into prosperity and happiness.

May we not complain, but may we proclaim the everlasting power of a supreme God. May we bring the hand of the Great Physician to the fevered pulse of our times, so that the beauty of holiness shall dwell in our hearts and under the mastery of the Master we shall usher in the reign of righteousness and peace.

And in His name we ask it. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 7488) to provide funds for the initiation of a mapping program in the State of South Dakota be rereferred from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request in respect to the bill (H. R. 7476) to provide funds for the initiation of a mapping program in the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on taxation evasion and to include therein excerpts from the statement of Elmer E. Irey, Chief of the Division of Intelligence of the Internal Revenue Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address which I delivered at memorial exercises held in the Capitol under the auspices of the United Spanish War Veterans, and also an address which I delivered at a joint meeting of the veterans' organizations at Norfolk, Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSPOLAR FLIGHT

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday at 11:22 o'clock in the forenoon the three triumphant Russian aviators, linking the Union of Soviet Republics of Russia with the Republic of the United States by air in a nonstop flight over the North Pole from Moscow, after traversing 5,520 miles of dangerous country in 63 hours and 17 minutes of flying, made a safe landing at the Vancouver Army air field at Vancouver, Wash., in my district. Vancouver is a thriving, progressive city, located at the head of deep-water navigation on the Columbia River, and is 4 miles above the mouth of the Willamette River and 39 miles from the great Bonneville Dam project on the Columbia River.

Chief Pilot Valeria Chkaloff, Copilot George Baiudkoff, and Navigator Alexander Beliakoff brought their huge monoplane down at 8:22 a. m. Pacific standard time—11:22 a. m. eastern standard time. They were the guests of Brig. Gen. and Mrs. George C. Marshall at Vancouver Barracks, an historic spot. Old Fort Vancouver, established by British forces in 1825, when it was an important station of the Hudson's Bay Co., is the oldest continuous settlement of the white race in the territory that now comprises the State of Washington. Early in their military careers, both Gens. George B. McClellan and Ulysses S. Grant were stationed at Fort Vancouver.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull hailed the Soviet transpolar flight in messages to Russian Ambassador Alexander Troyanovsky.

In a telegram to the Soviet envoy at Vancouver, President Roosevelt said:

I have learned with the greatest pleasure of the successful conclusion of the first nonstop flight from the Soviet Union to the United States.

The skill and daring of the three Soviet airmen who have so brilliantly carried out this historic feat command the highest praise. Please convey to them my warmest congratulations.

Secretary Hull wired:

Please accept my most hearty congratulations upon the successful termination of the hazardous flight of three Soviet airmen from Moscow to the United States over the North Pole. Will you express to them my warmest admiration for their splendid achievement?

The United States Embassy at Moscow was instructed to deliver appropriate felicitations to the Soviet Government.

LOG OF POLAR FLIGHT

(Time is eastern standard)

THURSDAY, JUNE 17

8:05 p. m. Russian-built monoplane bearing three "Soviet heroes" hopped from Moscow on projected 6,000-mile transpolar flight to San Francisco Bay.

FRIDAY, JUNE 18

5:00 p. m. Reported "all well" and flight proceeding normally.
8:00 p. m. William E. Gillmore, National Aeronautics Association agent, estimated plane was 550 miles from the North Pole. Ice formed on wings as plane approached polar region.

SATURDAY, JUNE 19

12:10 a. m. Plane passed North Pole.
3:20 a. m. "Everything all right" as plane reached point 320 miles beyond pole on North American side.
3:25 p. m. Fliers reported position 100 miles south of Fort Norman, N. W. T., about 1,250 miles north of Edmonton, Alberta.
4:30 p. m. Flew over Fort Mackenzie.
11:40 p. m. Reported they had turned toward Pacific Coast from Great Slave Lake vicinity and were following British Columbia coast line to Seattle.

SUNDAY, JUNE 20

12:05 a. m. United States Signal Corps at Seattle said plane gave position over Queen Charlotte Islands, "Everything going well." Islands approximately 500 miles north of Seattle.
2:10 a. m. Asked Signal Corps station at San Francisco for weather report.
2:25 a. m. Reported they were 50 miles west of the north tip of Vancouver Island, approximately 1,130 miles from Oakland.
3:02 a. m. Messaged they might have to land between Seattle and San Francisco because of lack of fuel. Reported flying at height of about 13,000 feet.
3:53 a. m. Without giving position, fliers reported they were in clouds and heavy weather. They requested Air Commerce Station at Bellingham, Wash., to help plane get radio bearings.
11:00 a. m. Without giving position, fliers reported to United States Signal Corps headquarters at Seattle, Wash., "Pump does not work, will land."
11:22 a. m. Landed at Pearson Field, Vancouver Barracks, Wash.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address I delivered on Sunday in connection with a resolution I introduced, and also to extend my remarks in regard to aviation reserves.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

HEROISM OF BOY SCOUTS RICHARD CHRISTY AND BILL CHRISTY

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to say a few words about the Boy Scouts of America apropos their coming to Washington within a few days for their national jamboree. Oklahoma is peculiarly interested in this jamboree by reason of unusual circumstances occurring in my district about a year ago. Two brothers there, Richard Christy and Bill Christy, sons of Mr. and Mrs. Barney E. Christy, of Granite, Greer County, Okla., recently received certificates of heroism for saving the lives of two girls last summer. The boys are 15 and 13 years of age, respectively, and are members of Troop No. 189, of Granite, Okla.

The brothers were not together at the time these lives were saved. The happenings were 1 day apart. The life of one girl was saved by Bill Christy on one day, and on the following day Richard Christy chanced to see a girl about to drown and plunged into the river and rescued her from drowning. The incidents are unusual in that each of the boys rescued a drowning girl 1 day apart in different bodies of water near their own home; and the awards are unusual in Scouting because the two recipients of these certificates are brothers.

In recognition of such distinguished conduct on the part of these young boys, the National Court of Honor of the Boy Scouts of America announced awards of certificates of heroism to these boys. My understanding is that on very few occasions has the Boy Scout organization given to brothers certificates of heroism for lifesaving at or near the same time. There were only seven Boy Scouts in the United States awarded these certificates during the year, and two of them came to the boys mentioned from my district. Naturally, I am proud that we have in the Seventh District of Oklahoma such boys as the Christy boys.

It goes without saying that this Scouting spirit will force itself into any community that can produce boys such as these. Scouting has made it possible for these boys to perform acts of heroism that will, in all probability, be to them an inspiration for great things in their future lives. These are just simply prairie boys, living in a small town in the right kind of environment, and directed by parents who are themselves teachers and believers in Scouting.

The incidents are so worthy of note that I feel impelled to ask the Congress to give to Richard Christy and Bill Christy, of Granite, Okla., this space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is small recognition to them, for they have made in the beginning of their lives as great a contribution to real Scouting as is possible for a boy to make.

They have my sincere congratulations, and I am sure the Seventy-fifth Congress is glad thus to honor them.

GOOD BEHAVIOR OF FEDERAL JUDGES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 227, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 227

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 2271, a bill to provide for trials of and judgments upon the issue of good behavior in the case of certain Federal judges. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]. I now yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2271, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, generally known as the judicial good behavior bill.

I shall not consume very much time on a discussion of the rule. There are to be 3 hours of general debate on the bill, and as far as I know there is no opposition to the rule, and I think there will be very little opposition to the bill when it has been explained to the House.

As you know, our customary way for the trial of Federal judges is through impeachment. I think we have all, over a period of years, come to feel that the only way to get rid of a Federal judge is through impeachment. Under the Sumners bill a method is provided which will relieve the Senate of the burden of the trial of impeachment cases of the inferior judges of the Federal courts. The bill only applies to district judges of Federal courts.

First, I will call your attention to the constitutional provision, which provides that Federal judges shall hold office not for life but during good behavior. We have rather come to assume that they hold office for life. They do not. They hold office, under the Constitution, only during good behavior. The purpose of this bill is to set up a court to judicially try the question of the good behavior of a Federal judge against whom impeachment charges have been preferred. Under the procedure set up in this bill we would proceed just exactly as we do today up to the point where an impeachment is voted by the House of Representatives. In other words, impeachment charges would be filed against a district judge. They would go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee would consider the matter thoroughly and investigate it, and it would come into the House and be debated, and we would vote upon an impeachment resolution just as we have always done. After the House has voted the impeachment resolution, then under this bill the procedure changes. Under this bill a court is set up, consisting of three judges of the circuit courts of appeals, to be selected by the Supreme Court of the United States. Those judges would then proceed to try the question of the good behavior of the judge whose good behavior has been questioned, and if upon trial of that cause they determine that his behavior was other than good behavior, he would then be removed from office; but no other penalty would attach.

There will be an amendment offered by the committee which will provide in case of those trials that after trial by the court in the first instance either side shall have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe you will readily grasp the benefits and advantages of this plan. Under our present procedure, which has been in effect for the past 150 years, there have been something like 13 impeachment trials.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

In only three of those cases, as I recall, have there been convictions. Whenever there is an impeachment trial it is necessary to consume the time of the entire Senate of the United States sometimes for a period of weeks on the trial of a question of whether a minor Federal judge shall continue to hold his office. In other words, the whole time and attention of one branch of the Congress is consumed in the trial of that relatively minor question as far as the country is concerned. Necessarily, with the manifold duties of Members of the Senate, that is an unsatisfactory trial. The Members of the United States Senate, with their other duties, are not able to sit through weeks of trial to determine whether a Federal judge has been good or bad. The result is that many of them are absent from the trial. If you have seen an impeachment trial in the Senate, you may have seen a half a dozen or a dozen Senators sitting there during the trial of the matter and the others are absent attending more pressing duties. It is most unsatisfactory to the Senate and to the judge whose conduct is being investigated.

This bill will protect the judges in every way, because it will give them as fair and impartial a tribunal as they now have, but one which will give its undivided attention to the trial of the issue. There will be no danger that a judge may be hauled up and tried for some trivial charge, because, first, it has to come under the present procedure, and there has to be an impeachment resolution offered on the floor. It must be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary and voted out, and then it must come back to the floor of this House and be debated before an impeachment resolution is voted. Only after that impeachment is voted can his conduct be tried.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes, and I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman has stated that a special trial court is to be named and convened to hear the cause?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The House having in effect brought an indictment, generally known as an impeachment?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Who is to prosecute the defendant before that court?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The Attorney General does that, or whomsoever he may designate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then we are to invoke an officer of the executive branch of the Government to prosecute a judge?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Well, that is the duty of the Attorney General when anybody is charged with anything.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a new thought to me.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is a new thought, but a very good one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is a political officer.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman understand that this measure supersedes the impeachment methods now practiced, or that it is merely suppplemental thereto?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is only supplemental.

Mr. COX. In other words it will still be within the rights of the House to proceed as is now the practice if it should so determine?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Absolutely. This is a mere matter of convenience.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I shall make a statement which will be of interest to the gentleman from New York. It is true that the Attorney General under the provisions of this bill should prosecute, but before he could institute a prosecution the House must first have determined upon and caused to be instituted the prosecution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that, but I should think that the consistent thing would be for the managers on the part of the House to follow the prosecution into this special court and not call upon an appointee of the President to do it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to the gentleman that that was in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield that I may propound a question to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. COX. Would it be the right of the House to proceed with impeachment as is now the practice rather than adopt the course made possible by the enactment of the pending measure?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. As I understand the question propounded by the gentleman from Georgia it is whether it would be legal, should this bill pass, for the House still to proceed and the Senate still to proceed under the impeachment power.

Mr. COX. That is right.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The answer to that question is yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one which comes at an opportune time. Its purpose is to provide procedure for the removal of judges who are guilty of misbehavior. There should be a method of removing Governors—yes; and the President—for misbehavior in office.

For the first time in the history of the United States armed forces of a State, Pennsylvania, acting on the orders of its Governor, who shall remain unnamed, have driven men—peace-loving, innocent, law-abiding men—who desire to work in their regular places of employment at their usual tasks, from the jobs which have enabled them to provide themselves and their families with the necessities of life.

For the first time in the history of our country a President of the United States has approved of the acts of a Governor who prevented the enforcement of the lawful orders of the courts of Michigan.

For the first time in the history of our country a President of the United States has approved of the acts of a Governor of a State, Pennsylvania, in driving peaceful citizens, lawfully employed, from their places of employment by armed force, because of the threat of a labor leader to incite violence.

For the first time in the history of our country a President of the United States violates his oath of office, refuses to comply with the provisions of section 5299, which makes it his duty, by the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States, or otherwise, to suppress insurrection and domestic violence.

On the contrary, he permits the invasion of the State of Michigan by armed forces from other States. His political friend, John L. Lewis, makes the invasion.

The statement of the foregoing facts discloses a situation so un-American, so unjust, so pregnant with disaster for us all that none would believe were the fact not known to all.

The Governor of Michigan had, we thought, plumbed the depths of infamy when he used the National Guard of that State to block the orderly processes of the courts.

The Governor of Pennsylvania has gone one step farther and has surpassed in effectiveness the action of Michigan's Governor.

Michigan used her armed National Guard to prevent interference with those who had kidnaped and were holding to ransom real estate, personal property, and jobs. The Governor of Pennsylvania, by show of force, threw men from the tasks which they were performing.

The Governor of Pennsylvania had a choice on Saturday last of determining the course which his State would follow. He refused to align himself with the organization which would give employment. He refused to align himself with the lawful worker.

He refused to align himself with the home owner and the taxpayer. He refused to align himself with the head of the family, who would provide food and shelter and clothing for those dependent upon him. He refused to align himself with the children, with the wives, who were dependent upon the worker for the shelter which protected them from the elements, for the food which sustained life, for the clothing which covered them.

He refused to align himself with the God-fearing, peaceable, law-abiding citizens of Johnstown, who but asked the right to proceed in a lawful manner about their business.

The Governor of Pennsylvania aligned himself with those marauding bands of gangsters who went about, under cover of darkness, throwing stones and bricks against the doors, through the windows, of the homes of workers.

He aligned himself with those who forced peaceful, law-abiding citizens to sit in their homes with loaded gun in order to protect themselves from night riders in automobiles.

He refused, when Johnstown was threatened with invasion, when her workers were threatened with being driven from the mills by force, to uphold the law of the State; to give those citizens and those workers the protection guaranteed to them by the Constitution and the statutes of the State.

He aligned himself with those who threatened invasion, and he fought and won their battle by using the forces of the State to close the mills, which was the object of their invasion.

The Governor of Pennsylvania aligned himself with the forces of lawlessness, of violence. Figuratively speaking, he took his place on the picket line with those who, by force, prevent men from working.

The Governor aligns himself, not with the lawful, peaceful, taxpaying citizens, not with the man who wants to sit by his fireside at night in the company of his family and in the enjoyment of his home——

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has evaded the instructions of the Chair; that he is palpably speaking outside of the rule; and now that the ruling has been made by the Chair, by rephrasing his words he is not speaking in order. We are talking about judges. We are not talking about Governors. eW are talking about the judiciary and not State governments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman, since the admonition of the Chair, has not transgressed the ruling; but the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Speaker for the liberality of his ruling and will endeavor to follow it in spirit as well as in letter.

GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA DRIVES MEN FROM THEIR WORK

The Governor of the State of Pennsylvania stood, and he is standing; he marched, and he is marching, arm in arm and shoulder to shoulder, with that organization which declares through the public press that it will call a general strike throughout the United States to enforce the will of its leader.

The Governor of Pennsylvania hails as a friend the man who, as president of the United Mine Workers, signed a contract with the coal operators, which provided that they should—

> At all times be at liberty to load coal into any transportation equipment whatsoever, regardless of ownership; to sell and deliver coal * * * to any person, firm, or corporation—and who now threatens to call a strike of the workers in the mines of those operators, if they exercise the rights granted them in their contract with him.

The Governor of the State of Pennsylvania and the Governor of the State of Michigan stand squarely behind the forces of rebellion, of insurrection. The President of the United States, unable to pack the Supreme Court, has, through his Secretary of Labor, packed the Board appointed to mediate disputes between employer and employees.

The Governor of Pennsylvania has established the doctrine that whenever John L. Lewis threatens to stage a riot, to invade a city, county, or State, the troops of that State will be called out to close the industrial plants, which have refused to sell their men down the river to Lewis, to acknowledge him as a dictator of labor.

How long are owners of plants to be deprived of their property, of their opportunity to give employment to the unemployed? How long are those who desire to work to be kept by armed troops from their places of employment?

What is to be the punishment of those who insist upon working? Of those who resist this effort of Lewis, Pennsylvania's Governor, and the President? Are they to be treated as were those who opposed authority in Germany or in Russia? In just what manner are they to be liquidated?

The President has just been given a billion and a half dollars to spend to assist in putting men to work, and the Governor of Pennsylvania, using the armed forces of the State, drives men from their jobs.

It is time we talked about good behavior not only of judges but of Governors; of the good behavior of the President, of the Secretary of Labor, and of those officers charged with the enforcement of the law.

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order; that he is not speaking to the rule under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan will suspend. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that the gentleman from Michigan is not proceeding in order in that he is not discussing the rule now under consideration. The gentleman, under the rule, should confine himself to the discussion of the resolution now pending.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I thank the Speaker.

This bill is not broad enough. Not only should judges, in their officeholding, be limited to the period during which they are on good behavior but the Governors of the various States should be removed from office if they fail to align themselves on that side which will enforce the laws, the orders of the courts lawfully made.

The President, by his request to the steel companies to close their plants, admits either his inability or his unwillingness to enforce law and order; to guarantee to the citizens of the States the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—the right to work.

John L. Lewis—I quote, "In the name of God"—calls upon the President to halt the back-to-work movement.

Think of this request. With a third of our people ill-housed, ill-nourished, and ill-clothed, John L. Lewis, who day by day is sending men to their death in his effort to prevent honest men from working merely because he wants more power, has the effrontery to again call upon the President, this time to close factories to workers.

And, stranger still, the President of the United States, instead of performing his duty and telling Lewis to order his picket lines away from the companies' gates, calls upon the plant owners to close those places which give work to the unemployed, bread to the hungry.

Is the President, like those who control in Russia, endeavoring to starve the workers into submission to Lewis' demands?

To bolster his cause, Lewis does not hesitate to send men to their death, usually staging a march on the workers in a struck plant on a Saturday night, so that a mass meeting can be held on Sunday and the deaths which he has caused be used to inflame the minds of those who listen.

Nine men went to their death at Chicago on Sunday, May 30, because they followed the methods approved by Lewis. In many other places throughout the land men have gone to their death, women and children have been injured, because they were seeking, under Lewis' instructions, to invade private property, to drive peaceful workers from their jobs.

It is significant that in practically all these cases where life has been lost and many severely injured it has been upon private property where those who suffered had no legal right to be.

John L. Lewis is the man whose United Mine Workers, in June of 1922, at Herrin, Ill., beat, shot, and hanged 25 unarmed, defenseless men because they opposed the will of Lewis.

The hands of John L. Lewis are red with their blood. Those red, dripping, bloody hands the President of the United States grasps in friendliness and he assists Lewis in his plans which have brought armed insurrection to many cities through the Union; who would bring about the deaths of thousands of our citizens in order to establish Lewis' supremacy over labor.

The President, by lending aid to Lewis, by bringing about the closing of mills in various places, has driven more than a hundred thousand men from their jobs.

Lewis, in his drive for power, has used the name of the President of the United States on literature, which gave the impression that Franklin Delano Roosevelt wanted men to join the C. I. O. Lewis has claimed, without contradiction, that four departments of the Federal Government were back of him. Lewis organizers' cars have carried the legend that the car was the car of a "United States Senate car, La Follette Civil Liberties Committee, investigators."

Notwithstanding all this active assistance given by the Federal Government, Lewis' drive for selfish power was met and turned back at Johnstown, Pa.; Youngstown, Ohio; at Monroe, Mich.; and now the President of the United States lends aid to this force of gangsters, armed with clubs, knives, bricks, stones, and guns; this gang which obstructs the delivery of the United States mail, kidnaps men, intimidates women and children, deprives people in want of the means to buy food and clothing; and, I repeat, the President aids them in these unlawful activities; and now, because of his acts, the purpose of Lewis has been accomplished and the fires in the mills have died and they stand silent, mute witnesses to the disgrace of Governors and of a President.

The situation cannot be confused by argument, sophistry, or a multitude of words. The question before our country today is, Shall men be permitted to work in a lawful manner at lawful tasks?

The false issue, the red herring which John L. Lewis and the President of the United States have dragged across the trail, is this question of signing a written agreement. That, however, as everyone knows, is not the real issue. The issue, restated, is: Shall men be permitted to work?

The President of the United States, the Secretary of Labor, the Governor of Michigan, the Governor of Pennsylvania, and many, many officers charged with the enforcement of the law have declared, either by word or by action, that they stand behind the C. I. O., which says that man shall not be permitted to work in these United States until his employer signs a contract with C. I. O.

This is the last of many, many steps which have been taken to bring about a revolution in this country.

If we sit here today and let the call which is going up all over this country for law enforcement, for the right to work, go unanswered, the day will come—and that soon—when we shall either acknowledge the President or Lewis as a dictator or be taken out and shot.

You may sit here today in fancied security, believing that the thing which came to the people of Germany, to the people of Russia, and of Italy, cannot touch you.

You gentlemen of the South who hold the balance of power in this Congress, who think that this thing cannot touch you; those very, very few of you—I know of but one—who now stand high in the councils of the C. I. O., should not be led to believe that your present position of favoritism and of security is permanent.

You should not forget those eight generals of Russia who were so recently lined up against a wall and shot. Here today, but gone tomorrow is a true saying in all revolutionary governments.

You may laugh; you may sneer at the words which I utter. You may ignore the facts, the situation which now exists, but not one man in this House but knows that the question is as stated.

Shall men have the right to work? Shall the protection thrown about them by the Constitution and the laws of State and Nation be given them? Or shall Lewis, backed by the President, maintain the dictatorship which he has established?

Not one man in this House but knows that today, now, we are faced with this question of whether we shall continue to retain our liberities or whether we shall yield them.

For myself, the decision has been made. I will take the chance of injury or of what may come, in order to maintain the right of men to toil; to furnish the necessities of life to wife and children; to live peaceably in their homes; to sit at fireside with wife and children, as evening shadows gather.

I would rather go back to my home folks, my friends, and my neighbors, those with whom I have lived and worked and played during the long, long years; join with them, fight with them and, if necessary, end my life in that fight, than to quietly, shamefully, and without resistance yield to this attempt to destroy our liberties and, in the end, if it succeeds, be led out and shot like a dog, on the orders of a dictator like Lewis.

The opportunity is still open to us to, by demanding enforcement of the laws, enactment of any needed legislation, employing the armed forces of the United States, bring about a peaceful settlement of this trouble.

All it needs is a declaration from the Chief Executive that, as long as men desire to toil, they will be protected in that right. All it needs is a declaration from the Chief Executive that protection under the Constitution, under the law, will be given to our people in their daily activities.

So far, the Chief Executive has failed in this respect. Violence has come upon us. Violence will continue, for our people will not quietly submit to the robbery of the heritage which they have enjoyed through the shedding of the blood of their ancestors.

Let us act now, or, in the days all too soon to come, see those near and dear to us meet the fate of those who have opposed dictatorship in the countries of the Old World; meet the fate of those who battle now in Spain.

The Chief Executive having failed, let us now unanimously pass a resolution calling upon him to take action, to make real the guaranties contained in our Constitution—the right to work, the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I therefore yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, to me, is of such importance that I will not take the time to answer some of the statements made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], who just preceded me, who only a few days ago urged his son or someone to obtain for him guns and ammunition with a threat to go to Detroit to shoot down all those who were trying and striving to obtain a better living wage to provide a better existence for their families and loved ones. No one regrets more than I the loss of lives in the city of Chicago and in other parts of our country. I hope that henceforth there will be no bloodshed and that the officers of the law will not lose their heads or abuse their powers. I express the further hope that we will shortly have a peaceful and favorable adjustment of all existing conditions and the elimination of all labor abuses. The gentleman, I regret, cannot refrain from feeding the House with political buncombe as he has tried today in attacking the administration and especially the great Governor of Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I cannot yield now.

Mr. COX. The gentleman does not mean by his statement that he approves what is being done, does he?

Mr. SABATH. I regret I cannot yield just now. I am only answering the gentleman from Michigan. Nor is it necessary for me or anyone else to defend the action of the great Governor of Pennsylvania. I am convinced and satisfied that he, who has been so assailed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], is endeavoring in a diplomatic and statesmanlike manner to put an end to the disorders and to prevent bloodshed, and to adjust this troublesome and grave situation with a view to early peace and settlement of differences. He is an able, honest, and conscientious executive, one who will have in mind the rights of labor and capital. It is to be regretted and deplored that the industrial leaders, profiteers, and overlords have in many cases refused to be fair or just to the wage earners who have made it possible for them to enjoy profits, the paying of large dividends, and the accumulation of great surpluses. I am immensely pleased that what I have said of the Governor of the great State of Pennsylvania applies to the Governors of Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, and of my State, Illinois. I have the honor and privilege of knowing each of them personally and regard them as men of sterling quality, capable and intensely interested in the welfare of the peoples of their respective States, all of whom are desirous of attaining the same results as the Governor of Pennsylvania. I feel that the people of these five States should be grateful that they have such honest, sincere, and well-meaning Governors.

God only knows what the conditions would be if they had Governors controlled by the vested interests. But I cannot refrain to say that it appears to me that the gentleman from Michigan must have been enlisted by the vested interests and joined hands with a reputed eminent writer from North Carolina, one J. W. Lindau, who claims that he has wired the Governor of Pennsylvania he would raise $2,000,000 to prevent his nomination as the Democratic candidate for President in 1940, and who, according to press reports, further states that he will raise an equal sum to prevent the nomination of Governor Murphy, of Michigan. I do not know Mr. Lindau but it seems that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] like Mr. Lindau, is not for a square deal for the wage earners of America. I fear that Mr. Lindau, who is so wrought up by the efforts of organized labor, may not have a great deal of trouble raising $2,000,000, but not by $10 donations from the profiteers and tax evaders. However, I wish to assure him that all the millions the reactionaries and vested interests may raise will not avail them and a candidate who will have the endorsement of the greatest President this country has ever had, a man fully as brave and courageous and possessing the same sterling qualities as our President, will be nominated and elected. I assure him that we have many outstanding men of such caliber.

IMPEACHMENT

Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the chairman and the Committee on the Judiciary on the resolution which is before us. If ever there was a proposition before the House which deserved the unanimous support of the membership it is this bill. I am interested in our judiciary. Years of investigation and the study of thousands of complaints which I have received proves to me that the people of our country are losing confidence in the judiciary. Consequently, I feel that legislation that will purge it of the weak, irresolute, lax, biased, and special-interest-controlled judges is legislation in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the unfortunate position in which the Committee on the Judiciary of the House has been placed three or four times during my service in the House, when they were obliged to go to another body and cope with its rulers, gentlemen who would defend the activities of some of the judges the House had impeached.

I am satisfied the action today will have a wholesome effect upon our judiciary. I know all the honest judges in the United tSates are in favor of such legislation, and I know it will have a wholesome effect upon the dishonest ones. During our investigation for 2½ years we found, I regret to say, that we have many judges in the United States who have brought shame and disgrace upon our judiciary. By rights these judges should not remain upon the bench any longer than is necessary to bring about their removal. I have called to the attention of the membership how many collusive activities are going on in many of our courts, and I am satisfied this measure will bring about the elimination of many of these abuses.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I am for the bill. However, would it not have been well if the agency set up to try the Federal district judges had been composed of men other than the district judges themselves? In other words, to go to a district judge or a group of district judges for trial of one of their fellows is something like going to a coach house for wolves.

Mr. SABATH. As I understand, the bill provides that circuit judges and not district judges will act.

I am indeed gratified and immensely pleased that this resolution is before us and that we shall have a chance to vote on it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to correct my statement?

Mr. SABATH. I cannot yield. I may say this, however, to my splendid colleague from the great State of Georgia, who has such a fine legal mind, that perhaps he might be able to improve the bill now, but that is nothing unusual. The Committee on the Judiciary reported my bondholders' conservator bill, and I thought I had a perfect bill. However, the Committee on the Judiciary has seen fit to eliminate some provisions which I thought would have been much better than the ones they inserted.

Mr. COX. I misread the bill. It is the circuit judges who are to try the district judges.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; the circuit judges.

Therefore, I say the resolution should be passed by a unanimous vote, as well as the bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SACKS].

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Speaker, there are no words I can utter to defend that great Governor of Pennsylvania, George H. Earle, which would explain his humane qualities and true democratic principles more than his own action. Does the gentleman from Michigan prefer the action of the President of his own party at Anacostia, or would he prefer the orderly prevention of bloodshed in Johnstown?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of order the gentleman is not proceeding in order. The Chair will state the rule and its proper interpretation.

Rule XIV provides as follows:

> When any Member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker", and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personality.

The matter now under debate is the resolution reported out of the Committee on Rules for the consideration of a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will kindly proceed in order under the rule.

Mr. SACKS. This bill, which deals with the behavior of judges, and, of course, all other officials, carries with it the implication that those officials will carry out their duties in accordance with their oath. I am sure the protection of human rights and the prevention of bloodshed are just as important to the orderly carrying on of government in a State as the protection of individual property rights. It is just as important for our officials to prevent bloodshed, prevent slaughter, and prevent people from being armed against others who are not, as it is to protect the right of a property to continue to operate. I feel that the great principle enunciated by our President, that in a democracy the protection of those human rights are just as important as protecting the watered stock of large corporations, structured on the sweat and blood of Pennsylvania citizenry.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is still proceeding out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will kindly proceed in order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is proceeding in order.

Mr. SACKS. That the good behavior of those officials is just as important to the continuance of the democracy as is the protection of property rights. In this case the officials did only what was necessary under the circumstances.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, may we have a ruling on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated the rule to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The measure under debate is the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules. It is impossible for the Chair to draw hard and fast lines as to the pertinency of debate, but the Chair trusts the gentleman will bear in mind the general proposition now pending before the House.

Mr. SACKS. The courage of his conviction, to establish a principle of government based upon the general welfare of the great masses, underlies his position of preventing bloodshed as against the former principles of special privilege to special groups, the economic royalists. To send troops into Johnstown to protect the mills was the policy of Republican overlords, which crushed the citizens of Pennsylvania for 40 years previous to his administration. Thank God that the phrase uttered by him in his campaign for election, "human rights above property rights", was not a mere utterance of the lips but a principle of action. This is true democracy. How different this picture from the one about 40 years ago in western Pennsylvania when armed forces slaughtered Pennsylvania labor in the then steel area. This was Republican glory—steel muskets and bullets to beat down labor. Democratic authority saved Pennsylvania this disgrace. More glory to you, George Earle.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

C. I. O. HAS RIGHT TO ORGANIZE LIKE ANY OTHER UNION

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, referring to the behavior of judges, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] turned to me and said that I had gone into the State of Michigan and had made a speech for the C. I. O., stating that I hoped the C. I. O. would be organized in the South. That is not wholly correct. I want labor organized in the South and everywhere, and the citizens can choose what organization they please. I am frank to say that I hope the C. I. O. is organized in mass industries.

Let us remember that the gentleman from Michigan made a statement the other day that he was going into some State, either Pennsylvania or Michigan, and that he was going to arm himself and march in the State. He said he had wired his son to get 200 rounds of ammunition.

Now, while we are talking about the behavior of judges let us talk about the behavior of Congressmen. [Applause.] I am getting a little bit tired of constantly hearing this ranting and roaring of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]. It is getting very boresome. But, speaking of his getting together an army and marching into a State, if we go back into history and study one of the famous judicial trials of the South, when Mr. John Brown came into the State of Virginia with arms and ammunition, he was tried for treason. Suppose Mr. John Lewis would announce, like a Congressman, that he was getting up an army to invade a State, what would happen?

But a Congressman can get up and say that he can invade a State with arms and ammunition, and have his son get ammunition, like John Brown's son did, and that is all right. That is fine; that is wonderful. But if John Lewis said that, he would be tried for treason, as John Brown was. He would be called a traitor on this floor; but we permit one of our own Members to do it. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; and a Congressman has no more right to violate the law of the land than John Lewis or anybody else.

We do a lot of talking here about these terrible, organized unions. But I want to know when came the time when an American could not get up and organize his fellow Americans into an organization to protect themselves. That is a democratic right, an inalienable Anglo-Saxon right, an American right, and a right of common sense and decency.

NINE MEN MURDERED BY POLICE IN CHICAGO

Over there in Chicago, nine men, something like six blocks from a steel plant, were attacked by the police and nine of them were murdered; and we stand here and not a soul has said a word about those nine free-born Americans who were murdered out there in cold blood. All we do is to spend our time criticizing organized labor; and then they criticize Governor Earle for correcting a bad situation.

GOVERNOR EARLE HAS PREVENTED BLOODSHED

What has Governor Earle done?

Governor Earle has prevented bloodshed. He has prevented the killing of human beings.

Oh, they say we ought to get the American troops, and a Congressman rises on this floor, who does not have to wear a uniform, and says, "We will have to use all the troops of the United States to have order."

NO CONGRESSMAN WILL ENTER THE ARENA OF BLOODSHED

There will not be any Congressmen among those troops that will shoot down the strikers; none of us will risk our skins in such bloodshed. There will not be a single Congressman there. We will stay on this floor, complain if the air conditioning is not good, say wise things, and be quite safe. Oh, my colleagues, all we do is to damn our fellow Americans because they are organized, and it is also a covert attack on the President of the United States because he does not call out the Army to shoot people down.

As far as I am concerned, I think the President has been wise and I think that Governor Earle has been wise. They have prevented the shedding of American blood. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not want the gentleman to be misunderstood. I am certain he would not want to imply that the Members of this House are not patriotic. I have the deepest respect for my colleagues in this body. We may differ on public questions, but Members desire, I know, to do what appears right and best for their country which they serve.

Mr. MAVERICK. No; and I have not said anything like that, either. I am saying, however, that one Member said he was going into a certain State and that he was going in there armed, and that is the same thing that John Brown did in 1859, and got hung for it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for the sake of the record?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. FISH. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Regular Army, under Robert E. Lee, put down John Brown.

Mr. MAVERICK. Who did it, or quelled the rebellion is not the point. I refer to the overt act of John Brown, who marched into Virginia with guns, and that action was called treason.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withhold that motion for the purpose of answering a question I desire to submit to him?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if I may, I withhold the motion a moment, although I think the gentleman is mistaken, because I do not recall his having spoken to me about the matter.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I have not spoken to the gentleman and I simply want to ask the gentleman a question now.

The SPEAKER. It is within the discretion of the gentleman from Virginia to withhold his motion.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I want the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, or some member of his committee, on the constitutionality of this resolution. It occurs to me, I may say by way of explanation, that the resolution runs right into the teeth of a constitutional provision on impeachment. I may be wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. May I say to the gentleman that I think he is wrong and I believe he will be thoroughly convinced, as I have been, when he hears the statement of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which will be made in a very few moments.

Mr. MASSINGALE. That is what I want to hear.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2271) to provide for trials of and judgments upon the issue of good behavior in the case of certain Federal judges.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2271, with Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes. This is a very important bill. I am going to explain it in a purely conversational way. There appear on the blackboard [indicating] the applicable provisions of the Constitution, to which I shall refer later.

We have had an interesting experience in the committee in developing this bill. I became interested in the subject matter of the bill during the first impeachment trial in which I participated a good many years ago. We had not gone very far in the trial of the case until it seemed to me clear that with us impeachment is not a criminal action or proceeding. Finally, we quite generally accepted that idea. The next step was to move away from criminal procedure and toward the procedure recognized in civil actions. The next step was in favor of the Senate availing itself of a committee to act as a master to hear the evidence, and so forth. While this has found some acceptance in theory, nothing definite has been done in that direction.

Finally, about 4 or 5 years ago I became thoroughly convinced that the good-behavior provision in the tenure clause of the Constitution is an issue that can be tried in a court. To me it has not been easy to work out a procedure and a tribunal which would provide the necessary safeguards, protecting judges against being harassed and at the same time providing a proper and fair tribunal to try the issue of good behavior. This bill is the best we have been able to do. I hope to help to make clear the scope and purpose of the bill and to establish the necessity for it and the constitutional warrant for it.

The great difficulty with the average American lawyer in properly considering what is proposed is that he came to the profession when it was an accepted notion among lawyers and laymen that judges can be ousted only by impeachment. He has never stopped to examine the question himself. A preaccepted notion has to be dislodged first before the mind will examine the new thing suggested it seems. That is going to be the trouble today.

This bill does not at all rest upon the provision of the Constitution dealing with impeachment. The thing which we are attempting to do here has absolutely no relationship to the impeachment power. The last part of article II deals with impeachment. That provision is written here on the blackboard. All civil officers are subject to the exercise of the power of impeachment. Judges are civil officers.

The other of the two applicable provisions of the Constitution appears on the other half of the blackboard. In this is the good-behavior clause which this bill seeks to have recognized; that is, "good behavior" as a justiciable issue. When we read that provision we find that judges are not appointed for life, but are appointed during good behavior. It is a condition attached to their right to hold office. When they violate that condition they not only bring disgrace upon the giver of their commission but they forfeit their right to hold office. If we get that in our mind, we then have the second proposition.

Then when we come to figure out how we are going to make effective the good-behavior provision in the Constitution, that provision in article III, we find that we cannot do it under the impeachment provision. If you read the impeachment provision, section 4 of article II, as it is written here, you will find that all power, all the jurisdiction which the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment can have or exercise is contained in that provision.

Let me physically demonstrate that. Suppose I erase the "good behavior" provision on the right-hand side of the blackboard and write in lieu thereof words which give unconditional life tenure. The power to impeach would not be disturbed. All civil officers are subject to removal by impeachment regardless of whether they may be commissioned for 1 year or a hundred years. Everybody agrees to that. Very well, we will rewrite the stricken words and we find that nothing has thereby been added to the powers of the Senate to remove by a judgment of impeachment.

Here is the third proposition, but perhaps I should make this preliminary statement. No rule of constitutional construction will admit that there are dead words in the Constitution. That is the third proposition I want to make. Everybody knows that every word in the Constitution is a living word. I believe we have demonstrated that the Senate does not and cannot make those words alive, those words which constitute the good-behavior clause in the judicial tenure provision. They cannot reach down to the next article of the Constitution where this provision is found. Their whole power is a power to impeach. That power is absolutely bound within the confines of section 4 of article II of the Constitution which I have quoted.

If the Senate cannot make vital the "good behavior" provision in the judicial tenure clause, and clearly it cannot do it, what agency of government can do it? The historical background precludes any notion that the President can effectuate those words, because those words went into the framework of the English constitution, from which we appropriated them, in order to prevent the Executive from having anything to do with it. So, by the process of elimination we come to a court as the only agency of government that can keep those words from being dead words in the Constitution. I think everybody must agree with that.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. I do not agree and I want to tell the gentleman my interpretation just in a word and ask him what is the matter with it. It has always been my opinion that the reason why "good behavior" was inserted in that clause of the Constitution was so that judges appointed for life could be impeached. In other words, if this provided that judges should hold their terms for life, then the language would be repugnant to section 4 of article II, and it is doubtful if you could impeach, and I think it is for that reason that section 1 specified the term during good behavior instead of life. What is wrong with that?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I say with all respect that is the expression of an immature judgment which is to be found in nine-tenths of American lawyers. I went through the same process or rather from the same starting point. We all start with the notion that we can only remove a judge by impeachment. This is what is wrong with it. All civil officers are subject to removal by impeachment. The length of the terms of office has nothing to do with it. Whether for 4 years, during good behavior, or for life, it is all the same. If they commit "high crimes and misdemeanors" and so forth they bring themselves within the powers of the Senate to remove by impeachment.

"Good behavior" by its nature is a justiciable issue. By its use it is made a condition in the right of every judge to hold office. It is a triable issue. There is no court to try it. This bill provides the court. If there is no court there is no agency to make effective that important condition in this particular section of the Constitution.

Impeachment had its origin in the fact that there were in England great offenders, too powerful to be tried in the ordinary courts. As a result of that, a custom grew up of the House of Commons preferring charges in the House of Lords against those great offenders and trying them before that house because it was in fact the supreme court of England. Do not forget that. They were tried before the supreme court of England, the House of Lords, sitting as the supreme court of that country.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. EATON. As a layman I should like to ask, does not good behavior mean that there is an absence of treason, bribery, or other high crimes? Is that not all that means?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No, not necessarily.

Mr. EATON. Why not?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think if my friend will let me move along for a while as I am going I can probably be more helpful.

Unquestionably it is a fact as everybody will agree that we took the provision of our Constitution under consideration from the English Constitution. Everybody knows that. I have in my hand a recognized authority as a commentator on the English Constitution, Todd. He says that "good behavior" in the English Constitution has always been recognized as a justiciable issue, triable in their courts by scire facias, a proceeding similar to our quo warranto.

May I make this statement, that I do not know of a single commentator on the English Constitution who does not recognize that "good behavior" is a justiciable issue. I do not know of a single one. Taking that provision from the English Constitution under the well-accepted rule of construction, it came to us explained and conditioned by the constructions attached at the time of our appropriation.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No. I am sorry, because the gentleman has one notion and I have another, and I just cannot turn aside for a private discussion with my good friend.

Mr. MOTT. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he confines his definition of "justiciable" to justiciable in court. It is justiciable if it is tried in Congress, is it not?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; it is not.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Is it not a fact that the clause in section 1 is simply a matter of contract between the appointee and the United States Government, that he holds office only as long as he behaves himself?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Surely.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Is that not the fact?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Surely. Everybody knows that, except one or two of my friends here. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to make a speech now in the ordinary sense. I am trying to explain in a conversational sort of way to intelligent people who have got sense enough to understand that we are dealing with an important matter.

It was recognized in England, when we brought this provision into our Constitution, that there were four methods of getting rid of judges: By impeachment; by joint address of the two Houses; by conviction for an offense; and by writ of scire facias, which is exactly the process that we expect to institute under this provision.

I do not understand any attitudes now. One group does not seem to want the judges to have any privileges or presumptions of decency at all, and another group wants to make it difficult to enforce the good-behavior condition in their contract with the people. A half dozen crooked judges can give character to the whole bench. [Applause.] The time has come when, if we are to preserve our courts, we have to do something about it by a method more sensible, fairer, and more effective than impeachment provides. I am friendly to the courts. I want them respected, but we cannot make the courts in America respected unless we compel obedience to the condition of good behavior contained as a condition in the judges' right to hold office. The only way to get rid of a crooked district judge now is to go over there to the Senate and take the time of the entire Senate, the United States Senate, away from all of the other business of a great nation, and make them sit there for days and days and days while we introduce evidence as though they were an ordinary trial court, when we know they are not a trial court. They will not sit there and try a district court judge. They would sit there to try a Supreme Court Justice, or the President, or the circuit court of appeals judges, but we know they will not to try district judges, and we can hardly ask them to do so. I am ashamed to go over there as the representative of this House of Representatives and ask the Senate of my Nation to sit and try a district court judge.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

We propose to take advantage of the centuries of experience of the people in England and of our own experience and submit ourselves to the direction of common sense and to do a sensible, practical thing within the Constitution. We propose to take advantage of the suggestions of common sense and try to bring about a better method. We have got a man sitting today on the Federal bench when more than a majority of the Senate said he should go off. We must have a favorable vote of two-thirds of the Senate, coming in and going out while the trial is going on. I do not blame them much. They will not sit there. We have got to do something about it if we have the constitutional power. The whole procedure is too ridiculous. The machinery is too cumbersome. The other business of the Senators is too important and pressing. There is not a sensible practical thing about the whole business of trying a district judge by impeachment in the Senate. We have done our best within the limits of due caution. We expect that experience will suggest improvements. But I would risk my life and what little reputation I may have for knowing a little something about the Constitution, that we are undertaking by a constitutional method to make alive the good behavior provision in the judicial-tenure clause of the Constitution.

It is a condition in our contract with these judges. How do you enforce a contract? You go into a court of the country, allege a violation of the contract, offer evidence in support of that allegation, and if you establish that the contract has been breached you get a judgment. We propose to make that possible.

Has any man the right to sit on the bench of this great Nation secure in a job for life, who will not behave himself? This is a serious matter and a matter about which we cannot afford to be squeamish. The only way we can reach a crooked judge is to go yonder to the Senate. This committee of which I happen to be the chairman consists of a fine lot of conscientious lawyers. We have studied this question and brought in the proposition almost unanimously. We are good friends of the judiciary of this country. You know and I know that we have got a fine lot of men sitting on the bench. They are too fine in the average to be messed up by half a dozen crooks on the bench.

I do not know of a single American or English lawyer or law writer of rank who after mature consideration does not recognize the living force of the good-behavior clause in article III, section 1.

It is a queer thing that the notion is so deeply rooted that because we may remove a judge by impeachment we may not remove him by court action in a suit brought to enforce a clear condition attached to his right to hold office. Let us consider the constitution of the average State. The constitutions of most of them have impeachment provisions practically identical with the Federal provisions. Suppose the State treasurer steals the money of the State. You would oust him from office by a trial and judgment of a court, but the fact that you could oust him by suit does not prevent your impeaching him, nor does the fact that you could impeach him prevent you from ousting him through the processes of the court. It is identically such an arrangement as is here proposed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I have a great deal of respect for the gentleman's legal learning. I want to ask the gentleman if in his opinion he thinks that the framers of the Constitution drafted section 1 with the idea that a Federal judge could or would ever be removed from office in any other manner except impeachment?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do think so, and I think if the gentleman will follow my reasoning he, too, will reach my conclusion. Suppose we wipe out the good-behavior clause of article III, section 1, could we not still impeach him under article II, section 4?

Mr. MOTT. You could impeach him.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; you could impeach him even if we struck out the good-behavior clause.

Mr. MOTT. But with that clause stricken out of article III there would be no tenure of office for the judges.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; you could put him in for life.

Mr. MOTT. Oh, no; not if you put him in for life.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You could not impeach him?

Mr. MOTT. The only way you could impeach him at all would be under section 4 of article 2.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am certain of my position; I will risk the opinion of the House on that. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Is there any accepted definition of the term "good behavior"? And if you reduce the seriousness which is presupposed by impeachment proceedings, are you in any way endangering trial for matters of much less importance than those now accepted as infringing on good behavior?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think good behavior is a matter for judicial construction and is a matter of fact.

Mr. Chairman, it is suggested that I answer some questions. I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Knowing how jealous the gentleman is of the prerogatives of the House of Representatives, I am wondering why in lines 5, 6, and 7, page 2, the words "or such counsel as may be designated by the House of Representatives" were stricken from the bill, thus placing the entire conduct of the trial in the hands of the Attorney General.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should make some explanation of the structure of the bill. There was a lot of difficulty encountered. I had the responsibility of framing the bill in the first instance. There was a lot of difficulty about it. First, we recognized that we had to keep some sort of a buffer between the judges and disgruntled litigants and attorneys.

That notion had grown out of our experience. Every man on the committee recognized that fact. The House of Representatives is the best buffer we could locate or provide. We could not beat that. Besides, if we used the House of Representatives to make the preliminary examination, there would be just that much less new structure, which is valuable in the building of a new law. Then we came to the point of determining who should prosecute. The first determination was that in addition to the Attorney General and as an alternative the House might designate other counsel to prosecute. Some question as to constitutionality and of the reaction of the Senate to that arrangement arose, and we struck out the provision allowing counsel other than the Attorney General or his designatee to prosecute. Prior to that suggestions were made that the Attorney General might institute prosecutions. We decided we would not permit the Attorney General to institute the suit in the first instance. We thought that would be putting too much power in the hands of the executive branch of the Government. We decided we would make this a suit of the United States against the particular judge involved, who is an officer of the United States, and we would ask the Attorney General, in view of the fact the Attorney General represents the United States in all litigation, to represent the Unted States in this suit.

Then we had a lot of difficulty about the set-up of the court. We have an amendment here. We provide a special session of the Circuit Court of Appeals shall be assembled. Then we undertook to give the power to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to constitute a court of inquiry, to be composed possibly of members other than of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the circuit where the case is to be tried.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Substantially, this legislation has the effect of taking away the trial and impeachment of Federal judges appointed for life from the Senate, to be prosecuted by the House, the Members of which are chosen by the people, and puts the trial wholly within the power of judges who are appointed for life?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. We did not attempt to repeal, of course, any of the powers of the Senate with reference to trials of impeachment. This is in addition to the right of trial by impeachment and it leaves the House in a position so that we can try out this new method and use either method which experience proves is the better.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. I realize the question I am about to ask should not determine the action to be taken by this body, but I should like to propound a question of the distinguished Chairman of the Judiciary Committee if in his opinion the House passed this bill as it is written, would it stand a ghost of a show of passing in the other body?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not know. That is not my responsibility and I am glad it is not. My judgment is the Senate should be glad to be relieved of the necessity to sit in the trial of district court judges.

Mr. SHORT. I should like to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee if in his opinion he can conceive of a case where a judge, if tried by members of his own profession, might not, out of jealousy, be perhaps persecuted or under other extenuating circumstances might perhaps not be prosecuted to the full extent he would be if tried by an independent body?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Here is what I think about that. I think a judge who is afraid to be tried by three judges of the circuit court of appeals, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, probably is just in a situation where he does not feel very easy anyhow.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KERR. The question involved in this matter, as I understand it, involves two concepts, one social misbehavior and the other legal misbehavior. Do I understand the gentleman thinks this three-judge court should have jurisdiction to try both the law and the facts in respect to whether there was involved either legal misbehavior or social misbehavior?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We did not believe the question should be submitted to a jury. That was our conclusion. We threshed that out very carefully. There is not a provision in here that has not some objection to it. We recognize this is more or less experimental legislation, but it is the very best we could do. The only substantial difference between this method of ouster and that by impeachment is in the trial forum.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman undoubtedly remembers that in 1909 when a resolution was introduced to impeach a judge for misbehavior, before that judge would submit to trial he resigned. That was the case of Judge Grosscup, judge of the United States District Court of the Northern District of Illinois. That might happen in many instances.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Do I understand that the bill now under consideration is cumulative as to remedies or is it exclusive?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is cumulative.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does the House have the right to impeach a Federal district judge if this becomes law or would it be taken from our jurisdiction and given to these lifetime judges?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It would not disturb the existing right to try by impeachment.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOSER of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman would permit, may I say that in the impeachment John Randolph, of Roanoke, introduced a constitutional amendment to provide for the removal of a judge by joint address of both Houses under the section just referred to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But not under this section. In England since 1701 they have had the power to remove judges by joint address. That arrangement came as part of the Acts of Settlement, when Mary and William came on the throne after Cromwell.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HILL of Washington. As Members of the House have authority to determine the qualifications of the Members of the House and their good behavior, is this more than an attempt to have the judges do the same thing with reference to district judges?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to the gentleman that I aimed to touch on that later. The gentleman has made a very fine suggestion.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman thinks this bill would not violate the Constitution. May I ask if the gentleman thinks a bill like this would violate the Constitution: When the House was of the opinion a judge was guilty of misbehavior and ought to be ousted from office they should so report or decide by resolution, and then the matter should be left to the President to decide whether the judge ought to be ousted, instead of being left to a court. Would this be constitutional?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; it would not. The historical background behind the whole thing establishes the fact that the reason those very words were put in the Constitution was to prevent the exercise of Executive power in that regard. I may not have clearly understood the gentleman's point, but I may say we cannot take such action. We have no power of removal by address; I think that is what the gentleman has in mind. We cannot do it that way.

Mr. MOTT. No; that was not quite it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. First, I would like to inquire, for the information of the House, how many district judges there are.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I believe there are one-hundred-and-eighty-odd, but I do not know.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. More than that; there are 280.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to my friend on that.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The House does not give up anything by following the procedure here contemplated?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The House institutes this proceeding.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to myself. I guess this is just as good a way to use time as trying to make a speech.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The resolution is introduced in the House and goes to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. After the Committee on the Judiciary investigates it reports to the House, expressing the belief that some Federal district judge has been guilty of misbehavior, and then the House acts upon it. We can proceed in that way and get the matter before the three circuit judges for trial, and we still have the power of impeachment?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. We give up nothing.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right. These Republicans are as smart as anybody at times. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I hope we are smarter.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right; that is true, too.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. As I understand, a judge could be guilty of gross misbehavior and not come within any of the provisions of section 4 of article II as to what would be a cause for impeachment, such as drunkenness or incessantly talking with the representative of one party when the representative of the other party was not present? This would be ground for removal because of misbehavior, but it would not be ground for impeachment under section 4. Is that correct?

Mr. SUMNERS of Txas. Technically, yes; but as a matter of practice there is not so much difference. The difference is more in theory than in practice, because when the Senate renders a judgment the court does not go behind it. The gentleman is right in theory.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I have not had the pleasure of hearing all the gentleman's address.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is the gentleman's fault.

Mr. MAY. I know, but I want to ask a question with respect to an amendment of the bill. In the provision relating to the court of three judges of the circuit court of appeals, I think the bill should have added to it by amendment at the proper place that none of the judges who constitute this court shall be a judge of the circuit court of appeals in the circuit within which the district judge resides.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understand. We had the same question up, but we came up against this difficulty. We were not sure we could authorize the Chief Justice to set up a court, so we attempted to utilize the present machinery but gave the Chief Justice the power to designate judges other than judges who are in that circuit. We met the gentleman's point as far as we could go.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LEAVY. This procedure would be in the nature of a civil action?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LEAVY. Proof would have to be established only by the greater weight of the evidence rather than beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LEAVY. Would a unanimous decision of the three-judge court be required?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not believe so. I think in America the principle that the majority in the absence of some provision to the contrary may speak the judgment is pretty well established.

Mr. LEAVY. The bill itself does not seem to cover this point.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; I do not believe it does. If the gentleman thinks it is necessary, I wish the gentleman would look it up.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. There is an election of remedies here.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Does the gentleman think that after having elected one remedy and pursued it, and failed in it, we could pursue the other one?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I believe we could, but I hope we would not try to. I believe we could.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. Will the trial court be circumscribed by the terms of the indictment of the House? Can they go beyond the indictment under the bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not believe they would be bound by the terms of the indictment.

Mr. O'NEAL of Kentucky. They must confine themselves to the indictment brought by the House?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not believe they would be limited. It would not be an indictment. It would be a civil action.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KITCHENS. In the Ritter impeachment recently held by the Senate, Judge Ritter was acquitted of all the specific charges, but I understand was convicted for failure to maintain good behavior while a judge. The Senate having assumed jurisdiction under section 4, article II, to try judges for good behavior, and claiming this right under the Constitution, how can we take that right away from the Senate?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. By passing this bill you will not take any right away from them. You cannot touch the power of the Senate. We do not attempt to do that.

Mr. KITCHENS. There cannot be any question about that in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not a bit.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for some factual information?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The bill applies only to Federal district judges?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. How many of them are there?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Somebody said about 200.

Mr. HOBBS. One hundred and fifty-four.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes, or such part of that time as I may use.

Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for the legal opinion of the chairman of this committee. I have told him that if he will convince me that this is constitutional I will vote for the bill. I had some experience with him, in a humble way, in trying an impeachment proceeding before the Senate, and I think I am justified in saying there was not an average attendance in the Senate of 15 Members during that entire impeachment trial. I think a judge would get a fairer trial under this kind of an arrangement, and as I have said, if I were sure of the constitutionality of it, I would certainly be in favor of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. GUYER. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I consider the gentleman one of the great legal minds of this House——

Mr. GUYER. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the gentleman in favor of this bill or opposed to it?

Mr. GUYER. I am in favor of it if I am convinced it is constitutional, because I believe it is a better way to get a fair trial for a Federal judge than by trial in the Senate when only a dozen of the Members stay there and listen to the evidence.

Mr. CRAWFORD. From the gentleman's study of the bill, does he believe it to be constitutional?

Mr. GUYER. I am not sure about that, and I am waiting for these great legal minds to convince me.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUYER. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. If this bill is enacted into law, it will transfer from the Senate to the three judges appointed by the Chief Justice the prerogative of the Senate to sit as a trial court and pass judgment in the matter.

Mr. GUYER. You cannot take any power from the Senate. It has sole power to try all impeachment proceedings. The chairman of the committee contends this is not an impeachment trial but a trial upon good behavior.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am quite confident my appearance upon the floor will not be greeted with the assertion that I am a great legal mind. As a matter of fact, I approach the discussion of this matter with considerable trepidation and shall only discuss one phase of it. I cannot boast of having studied the subject to the extent that the chairman of the committee has studied it or the other members of the committee. Whether or not we have the power to set up a device which may, in effect, prevent the Senate from ever passing upon the qualifications of a district judge, I do not know. It strikes me, at first glance, as somewhat startling, but there is one phase of this bill to which I should like to call your attention, and that is the provision which lodges with the Attorney General of the United States, at the behest of the House, the duty of prosecuting a judge who is under charges.

The machinery, of course, has been described. Someone comes to the House of Representatives, responsible people, we will assume, and especially to members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and brings a complaint against the behavior of a district judge. The committee makes its preliminary investigation, makes up its mind that the judge's behavior has been unworthy, that he is unfit to be a judge, and so reports to the House of Representatives, and upon the passage of a resolution the House, by a majority vote, starts the judicial process under which this judge will be put on trial, and as it starts that process it designates the Attorney General of the United States to be the prosecuting officer. It strikes me that whereas this procedure, as described by the gentleman from Texas, might be smoother, might do away with some of the admitted faults of the old-fashioned procedure involving the trial of impeachment in the Senate, this provision calling upon the Attorney General of the United States to be the prosecuting officer is a fly in this ointment so large that, for one, I could not support the measure.

When we call upon the Attorney General to prosecute a judge we are calling upon an executive officer appointed by the President of the United States, subject to the President's will, a member of his intimate Cabinet, his own personal choice, with political implications inevitably involved in their relationship. We might just as well say—because I think the effect in practice would be the same—that the President should prosecute this judge.

I would hesitate, indeed, I would resist any proposal for the dragging in of the executive department of the Government when a judge is on trial. Remember, the executive department is headed by a President who will have appointed these three judges.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Oh, no.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The President appoints the circuit judges.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman means to say that some President appointed these judges.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I stand corrected, of course. That was my error.

At any rate, they are Presidential appointees and the principle still holds, and I do not believe that a Presidential servant, the Attorney General of the United States, should prosecute a judge, himself a Presidential appointee, before other judges who themselves are Presidential appointees. You are injecting the Executive power into this situation in such fashion as to create very, very dangerous possibilities.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the gentleman's argument lead to the conclusion that judges ought not to try issues in which the President is involved; in other words, what is the use of having judges?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is an issue somewhat different from the issues to which judges give their attention in their long years of judicial tenure. This is a special sort of issue, and the Executive should be kept out of it. The Executive is kept out of it in our present procedure. Would the House of Representatives, for example, change the present procedure, and when it brings impeachment charges against a judge and takes them over to the Senate designate the Attorney General of the United States to be the manager on the part of the House? It would not. Yet that is what you propose to do here.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am always interested in any position that the gentleman from New York takes, because he gives it thought; but does not the attitude that the gentleman assumes in this case about the right of the Attorney General to appear in behalf of the prosecution, if followed to a conclusion, lead to this kind of absurdity of analogous terms, that because the President of the United States appoints under the law and the Constitution a Federal district attorney it is unfair to a man prosecuted in the Federal courts for violation of law that he do so, especially in view of the fact that the judge who tries the case is also a Presidential appointee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the suggestion of the gentleman is not analogous. Here we are dealing with three independent branches of the Government, and it should be our hope and intention never to let any one of them become supreme over another. [Applause.] It is quite different from a case at law where the United States attorney is prosecuting somebody for violation, we will say, of a provision of the Interstate Commerce Act. This proposal involves the position of the judiciary, and it incidentally involves the position of the House of Representatives. In my judgment, if the House is to bring the charges before a court, the House should prosecute them through its own managers and keep the Executive out of the whole picture.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. It might be on occasion that the judge may be indicted by this House for an offense or for misbehavior in a case in which the Attorney General might have been involved.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BOILEAU. And in view of the fact that the bill with the committee amendment provides the Attorney General or someone appointed by him shall prosecute the case, there is no escape from a situation of that kind, and does not the gentleman believe that the matter can be properly safeguarded by striking out the committee amendment and leaving the language in the bill as originally written, so that the House could, if it saw fit, take it away from the Attorney General and appoint counsel?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would not have the bill provide that the House could designate the Attorney General at all. Otherwise I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. DONDERO. And you could go further and say that the Chief Justice is a Presidential appointee and he must designate the three judges who shall constitute the court to try the judge charged?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That might be possible, though the analogy does not exist to quite the same extent, because the Chief Justice is a member of the same department as the judge under trial.

Mr. DONDERO. But he is a Presidential appointee.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman does not mean to imply that we have Chief Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States and circuit judges, merely because appointed by the President, who would not give a fair trial? That seems to be the strongest accusation against the judiciary of this country that I have ever heard.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have made no such accusation with respect to the Chief Justice of the United States, and I would not make any such intimation against the judges of the circuit court of appeals; but I have been in public life long enough to gage public opinion and know that when the executive department is authorized to interfere in a case of this kind, the public begins to suspect "politics." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GWYNNE].

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Chairman, I believe this legislation is beyond the constitutional powers of this Congress and I desire to confine my remarks only to the constitutional question. I cannot agree with the chairman of my committee that the words "during good behavior", upon which the constitutionality must hang if it hangs anywhere, are dead words, no matter how you construe the Constitution. They were put there to fix the tenure of office of the judges. In England, as you know, the judges held their office subject to the will of the King, and the matter was discussed very thoroughly to make it very sure that our judges should hold their office for life or as long as they behaved themselves. I agree with the chairman that they are justiciable, that is, I think the issue of good behavior is justiciable. The obligation is put by the Constitution upon the judges to behave themselves, and it allows them to hold office only so long as they behave themselves. If that is true, and it is, of course, the framers of the Constitution must have had in mind some machinery to determine when the judges had not behaved themselves and were subject to removal. That would be clear, I take it.

I think there are four possible theories as to where the framers meant to vest that authority. First, you might say they meant to vest it in the executive department to determine this question of good behavior. That theory you can put out of the window at once. The entire history is against it.

The second theory, and it is one which has often been advanced, is that the Constitution meant the judges to have authority to determine when members of the judiciary were guilty of misbehavior. There is some argument both for and against that proposition. We need not discuss it here, however, for the simple reason that if they do have this authority they have it by virtue of the Constitution, and nothing we can do can add to or detract from it.

The third theory would be that the framers meant that Congress could set up machinery to determine this question of good behavior, such as this bill.

The fourth theory would be that the machinery set up in the Constitution itself, impeachment, is the exclusive means for trying out this question of good behavior.

I realize arguments can be made in favor of both the third and fourth theories. It is my judgment, however, that the weight of the argument is in favor of the fourth theory—that is, that this justiciable issue of good behavior can be determined solely by the impeachment remedy in the Constitution.

I want to just mention four arguments that bring me to that conclusion, and I shall only have time to mention them. The first is a principle of statutory construction, very familiar to every lawyer, which is this: If a written instrument sets up or creates a certain obligation and also creates machinery to enforce that obligation, it is deemed that that machinery is exclusive. That is a rule that has been applied probably in a thousand cases. I do not wish to take the time to cite the cases, but, Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks to insert a collection of authorities on this and other questions on this general proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GWYNNE. It is a general rule of construction that where an instrument creates an obligation and sets up procedure for enforcing that obligation, that such procedure is exclusive of all others.

The general rule is stated in Pollard v. Bailey (20 Wall. 520) as follows:

> A general liability created by statute, without a remedy, may be enforced by an appropriate common-law action; but when the provision for the liability is coupled with a provision for a special remedy, that remedy and that alone must be employed.

The Supreme Court of the United States has followed and applied this rule in many cases.

In Globe Newspaper Company v. Walker (28 Sup. Ct. Rept. 726), the Court held that the remedies of forfeiture and penalty and of injunction given by Congress to the owner of a copyright, in case of infringement, are exclusive, and preclude resort to action at law to recover damages.

The principle was again applied in Middleton National Bank v. Toledo A. A. & N. M. R. Company (197 U. S. 394), which was an action brought outside the State of Ohio to enforce the stockholders liability given by the statutes of that State. The Court held that the statutory method providing for enforcement of this obligation in the courts of the State must be followed, and excluded all others.

This rule is universally recognized throughout the various courts. The authorities are summarized in Twenty-fifth Ruling Case Laws, section 228, as follows:

> A liability created by statute without a special remedy may be enforced by an appropriate common-law action. However, it is a general principle of interpretation that the mention of one thing implies the exclusion of another thing, expressio unius est exclusio alterius.
>
> A statute that directs a thing to be done by a specified officer or tribunal implies that it shall not be done by a different officer or tribunal.
> A statute that directs a thing to be done in a particular manner ordinarily implies that it shall not be done otherwise.

As examples of cases applying this general doctrine, see the following: Taylor v. Taylor, Administrator (66 W. Va., 283); People v. Gibson (53 Colo., 231); Newcomb v. City of Indianapolis (141 Ind., 451); and City of Des Moines v. Gilchrist (67 Iowa, 210).

It is a generally accepted rule that provisions in a constitution are mandatory and not directory.

For cases in which this rule has been applied, see the following: Commissioners of Sedgwick County v. Bailey (13 Kans., 600); and Cohn v. Kingsley (Idaho) (38 L. R. A., 74; 34 L. R. A., 487; 32 L. R. A., 203).

However, before we can say that rule would apply here, we must determine first of all that the remedy of impeachment is as broad as the obligation of good behavior—if you see what I mean. In other words, can you impeach a judge for everything which is not good behavior? I say clearly you can. I think most of our misunderstanding of this subject comes from what may have been the unfortunate use of the words "high crimes and misdemeanors." The trouble is we use those words in a criminal sense usually. They are not used here in their criminal sense but in their social sense. The framers of the Constitution experimented with various words and finally adopted those words because they took them out of the English impeachment which they knew so well.

Now, what do they mean by "high crime and misdemeanor" for which a judge may be impeached? In England it was never held that to be subject to impeachment the judge or any other individual need to have committed any crime. If you will read the debate in the Constitutional Convention and particularly the statement may be Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist, it clearly indicates that they meant a judge could be removed through impeachment, for anything which made him unfit as a judge.

For example, they asked Alexander Hamilton, "What would you do if a judge became insane?" He said, "Clearly, he is subject to impeachment." As a matter of fact, we have impeached a judge solely because his insanity rendered him unfit to be a judge.

I suppose no one has expressed that thought better than the late Chief Justice Taft, speaking before the American Bar Association in 1913, when he said this:

> Under authoritative construction by the highest court of impeachment, the Senate of the United States, a high misdemeanor for which a judge may be removed is misconduct involving bad faith or wantonness or recklessness in his judicial actions, or in the use of his official influence for ulterior purposes. By the liberal interpretation of the term "high misdemeanor" which the Senate has given there is now no difficulty in securing the removal of a judge for any reason that shows him unfit.

In other words, if I make myself clear, a judge can be impeached for anything which is not good behavior. That is, the remedy in the Constitution is as broad as the obligation. Therefore, that well-known rule of construction applies, that rule that is a refinement of the well-known rule that the inclusion of one is the exclusion of others.

The second reason I want to give is this, and this is based on another principle of constitutional construction: Many times in construing statutes a court must decide whether a certain provision is mandatory or directory. In deciding that question the court determines what the intent of the Congress was in passing the statute. In construing the Constitution, however, in construing every constitution, every single provision in it is not directory but is mandatory.

Here we have a provision which provides how this question of good behavior may be determined. I maintain under this well-known rule that we cannot treat it as directory and set up some machinery ourselves, but we must treat it as mandatory and use the machinery that is set up in the Constitution.

The third reason is based upon the debates had in the Constitutional Convention and statements made in the Federalist, which lead me to believe that they had in mind very clearly to limit the removal of judges exclusively to this impeachment proceeding.

Someone suggested in the Convention that at the time in England they could remove a judge by an appeal of Parliament to the Crown. Somebody suggested that should be in our Constitution, but it was voted down. The question of impeachment received a great deal of consideration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GWYNNE. I think no one has expressed that thought better than Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist, where he said this, speaking about the judiciary:

> The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachment. They are liable to be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate, and if convicted may be dismissed from office and disqualified for holding any other.
>
> This is the only provision on the point which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character, and is the only one which I find in our own Constitution in respect to our own judges.

That was the opinion, at least, of Mr. Hamilton.

Let me call attention also to the statements made by Delegate Rufus King and others who clearly indicated that they had in mind putting in this impeachment machinery as the sole means of removing judges.

The fourth argument that I would make against this bill is based upon the history of impeachment itself. Back in the early days of England, as we all know, all the powers of government were under the Crown. There was no real distinction between impeachment and indictment. A battle was going on constantly between the Commons and the Crown to get for the Commons some part in their own government. Somewhere along that road they discovered the machinery of an independent judiciary, and that was the time when liberty and freedom really came on earth. [Applause.] Now, if you are going to have an independent judiciary, or an independent Executive, or an independent Legislature, you must have some system of checks and balances for them to protect themselves and to check the other coordinate branches of the Government.

At the time we adopted our Constitution impeachment had been developed to the place where it was a legislative check in England against the judges and against the Crown itself.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that when we adopted our Constitution there had not been an impeachment in Englahd for 125 years?

Mr. GWYNNE. That is true.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Does not the gentleman feel that the reason for the framers of the Constitution adopting section 4 of article II and section 1 of article III was really to maintain the independence of the judiciary and to make it forever free from Executive domination and interference?

Mr. GWYNNE. I have not the slightest doubt of it. In answer to the question suggested by the chairman of the committee, the framers of the Constitution understood, at least, and realized the value of impeachment as a check and balance, and they adopted it for that purpose. One thing indispensably necessary to constitutional government is that the checks and balances must be in the Constitution itself. It is impossible to have constitutional government with checks and balances if one body can devise out of its own ingenuity schemes for checking the other body which are not in the Constitution itself. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, it is indeed with great reluctance that I take exception to the position taken by our distinguished chairman, for whom we have indeed a most abiding affection; but I deem it my duty, notwithstanding, to take issue with him, because this question is highly important and should be deliberated from every possible angle.

Mr. Chairman, from my review of the cases, the Constitution itself, the authorities, and the debates in the original Constitutional Convention, I am firmly of the conviction that we have no authority whatsoever to pass this bill. I sympathize fully with the objectives sought; I believe that the trial of an accused judge by impeachment is highly unsatisfactory; nevertheless, despite my sympathy with the objectives of the bill, I do not believe that it can be accomplished legally or constitutionally. There is no short cut. If we want to change the method of trial of judges accused, we must follow the Constitution. To do it in the way that our distinguished chairman wishes to do it would require, beyond peradventure of doubt, a constitutional amendment.

We often grow impatient with our judiciary, and especially so when they decide against us or when they in their decisions or opinions develop economic or political views differently than we would, or when we do not agree with the results generally, even though it does not affect us materially; but when sensible men viewing in retrospect what our district courts, our circuit courts, and our Supreme Court have done they will have naught but praise for our courts. Consider the record for years and our courts will come forth triumphant. I grow somewhat impatient when I hear so many improvident attacks upon our judiciary. Even in the debate on this bill today intemperate remarks have been made with reference to their work. Those remarks have no place here.

I want to punish judges when they merit punishment. I would be derelict in my duty if I would not impeach a judge whom I felt was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors or guilty of misbehavior, but I do not want to take means of punishing the judges unless those means are legal and constitutional.

I want to maintain as much independence for our judiciary as is possible, and the only way that we can maintain an independent judiciary is to make attack upon them difficult, not too easy; otherwise the judges will no longer be independent, but will truckle to this influence and that influence, to this personage and that personage, and we would, therefore, strike a decided blow at the judiciary and destroy their independence. [Applause.] Now, insofar as you make these attacks upon the judiciary easier I am against it.

The other evening I was reading from the famous French philosopher Montesquieu. He said:

> There can be no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and the executive powers.

Insofar as this bill will make attacks upon the judiciary easier, since the impeachment is more difficult, you will not have that distinct and necessary separation between the Executive and the judiciary, between the legislative and the judiciary, particularly since the prosecuting officer in these proceedings would be a member of the President's Cabinet, a most responsible agent of the Executive, the Attorney General. The power to attack courts, especially in these parlous times, should be sparingly used. Impeachment is difficult. It should remain so.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. But the Attorney General could not proceed until the House by majority vote had decided that impeachment was necessary.

Mr. CELLER. That is true beyond question, but there is the gravest and the highest responsibility placed upon the Attorney General with reference to the duties outlined for him in this bill.

When we consider the history of our district judges and our circuit judges, it is well to keep in mind that there have been comparatively few impeachments during the 150 years of our existence as a nation, very few. District judges as a class, just like Congressmen as a class, have had within their ranks a few renegades. The judges are not all perfect, you cannot help it, they are human; but just as we in the House have had our renegades and have punished them, so the outside agencies have punished theirs.

In 148 years since the Constitution only nine judges have been impeached. Of the nine judges impeached, five were found innocent. Only four were found guilty.

Since the bill has been changed to include an appeal to the Supreme Court, my criticisms in my minority record against failure of appeal were well taken. We now have appeal.

Just because one or two have strayed from the path is no reason why we should bring a wholesale indictment against all of the judiciary in the land. That is the feeling behind this bill, and that is one of the reasons why I am opposing it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I ask the gentleman from New York if it is not a fact that the small number of prosecutions has resulted from the protection which the House has given, acting as a buffer, and if we do not reserve that in this bill?

Mr. CELLER. I do not agree with the gentleman. It is a very simple matter for a man to rise and impeach a judge. If he wants to take the responsibility, let him do so, but Members may be fearful at times to take the responsibility of impeachment. That is unfortunate. The mere fact that during 150 years we have only had nine judges impeached, and only four successfully, I repeat that our judiciary is as good as the judiciary of any land under the sun.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman is making a splendid argument. Does he not feel it is much better to tolerate the abuses of a very few than to intimidate all the members of the judiciary by setting up a new plan?

Mr. CELLER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Is it not true that one of the nine judges the gentleman mentioned a moment ago was a Justice of the Supreme Court and would not come within the jurisdiction of this bill?

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is right, and I thank him for his observation.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. And the judges of the Commerce Court have been abolished, which further reduces the number.

Mr. CELLER. Even taking the nine, the House was mistaken apparently in five and only four were found guilty of the charges for which impeachment was had.

I may say with all due deference to the author of the bill that the best argument against its validity is its novelty. I said this in the minority report and I am going to repeat it:

> It scarcely can be believed that the framers intended vesting Congress with an important power and then so skillfully concealed it it could not be discovered save after 150 years.

[Applause.]

Speaking of the independence of the judiciary, I meant to say a few moments ago what Hamilton said so skillfully and effectively:

> This independence of judges is equally requested to guard the Constitution and the right of individuals. The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachment. They are liable to be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate, and if convicted may be dismissed from office and disqualified from holding any office. This is the only provision on the point which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character.

I have before me the Federalist, volume 2, numbers 65 and 66, with contributions by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay. It covers the matter of impeachment. There is a clear indication that the framers of the Constitution wished to limit beyond any question the right to impeach and try judges, to limit the right of removal, to the Congress of the United States. Particularly we are told that efforts were made to set up a different tribunal. An effort was made to set up the Supreme Court as a tribunal to try these recreant judges. We are told by these savants that the framers in the Constitutional Convention rejected every solitary one of the proposals other than the one we find in the Constitution.

Now, that is the best argument in the world. They rejected every single proposal, except that the House shall impeach and the Senate shall try the cause. The House shall be the sole entity to bring impeachment charges. We are told in article I, section 2:

> And the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

We are told in article I, section 3:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

The use of the word "sole" in those two particulars undoubtedly is most significant, particularly in the light of the history of the Constitutional Convention, which we are told rejected all alternatives except the one we have followed for 150 years. Therefore, I cannot lay too great emphasis on the use of the word "sole" in two instances. To my mind the conclusion is inescapable that the only way you can try these judges is by the method that the Constitution allows us to use, and I do not care what you call the trial, whether impeachment, ouster, removal, or by any other name.

Mr. LEAVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. Under this act is not the sole method, manner, or way in which proceedings may be instituted still lodged with the House of Representatives?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; but we are adding another remedy. We cannot add that remedy because the Constitution forbids, because the Constitution says there shall be one sole tribunal, not a tribunal composed of the Supreme Court Judges or a tribunal composed of three Circuit Court of Appeals judges selected by the Supreme Court, not three Daughters of the American Revolution or three presidents of chambers of commerce. If we have the right to say that a Supreme Court Justice shall select the Circuit Court judges to act as a tribunal, then we have the equal right to say Tom, Dick, and Harry shall be the court to try these district judges. We would equally have the right to say that three presidents of three distinct chambers of commerce, or three members of the Daughters of the Nile, or three Members of Congress, or three women of the Ladies' Sewing Circle of Tallahassee, Fla., may try these judges. You have the same right in one case as you have in the other. I deny that you can do that. If we have the right to set up another ouster court, we can with equal grace pick our own judges. We are the sole judges of the judges.

Just because the Senators have not done their duty in hearing the causes, and just because Senators walk in and out of an impeachment trial and few, if any, remain throughout the entire proceeding, and few, if any, have encompassed in their minds what it was all about, so far as these prior impeachments are concerned, is no reason why we should change the method or attempt to change the method. There is only one answer to the argument the Senators have not done their duty. They must do their duty, and they should be criticized into doing their duty. They must be made to do their duty. They could easily have a subcommittee hear the case, and that subcommittee could report to the Senate. The fewer members of the subcommittee could and would attend all hearings.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Whether the Senators are actually present or not, they read the hearings and are informed when the time comes to vote.

Mr. CELLER. I think that may be sound. However, it was argued that if the Senators do not do their duty and therefore we must change the method, but I cannot see any efficacy in that argument.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. Sometimes Members of the House are a little derelict in their duty. I am sorry that more Members are not on the floor now to hear the very clear, cogent, and convincing speech of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman for those kind words. I agree to settle for half.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am trying to get at the truth of this matter with the limitations of a layman's mind. May I ask the gentleman if we do not hear it said all the time that Federal judges are too far removed from the people? We hear that criticism reiterated over and over again. If we enact a system whereby punitive measures will be applied to delinquent Federal judges by the courts, and thus remove their trial from Members of Congress who are elected by the people, will not judges be further removed than ever from the people? Is that not an objection to this bill?

Mr. CELLER. I think that is, indeed, a very sound argument.

Mr. KERR. Does the gentleman think the question of good behavior refers to the offenses designated here for which a person is impeachable?

Mr. CELLER. I shall come to that in a moment.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Under the present system, before a Member of Congress presents charges he at least gives them study and consideration before the House is asked to act. If this bill becomes law, a Member could at any time submit a charge, whether right or wrong, and then, automatically, from what I gather from this argument, the matter would be referred to some committee and then referred to this tribunal of three judges.

Mr. CELLER. I think the gentleman is somewhat in error. Under our present practice there must be a resolution of the House to impeach.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I appreciate that.

Mr. CELLER. Under this proposal there must likewise be a resolution to start the proceedings.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. But it comes from no responsible source. We would have to take the word of some other people who say this judge did this, that, or the other thing. Has the Committee on the Judiciary power under this bill, if it becomes law, to investigate?

Mr. CELLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is what I want to know.

Mr. CELLER. I presume our Committee on the Judiciary would not act unless they had investigated, and they would undoubtedly initiate the proceeding in both instances, under the present practice and under the proposed practice.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. If the present system, principally because of the attitude of the Senate, justifies this legislation, and we create a more dignified forum, so to speak, for future trials, why is it the judges of the circuit court of appeals are not entitled to the same consideration?

Mr. CELLER. I do not know why. I think the point is well taken. If one district judge can be tried by three circuit judges, I can see no reason why the reverse should not be true. I cannot see why a tribunal of three district judges could not be set up to try one circuit judge. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and if we have the power to do all this, we can try circuit judges in one way and district judges in another way. There is no question about the fact we could try the district judge one way and the circuit judge another way. But why treat them differently. They are all Presidential appointees.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I want to get on with my argument, and this is the last time I shall yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I want to get the gentleman's view as to whether or not the term "during good behavior" is not more elastic than the provision set forth in section 4 of article II with reference to impeachment?

Mr. CELLER. I shall come to that in a moment.

With reference to the matter of good behavior, here we are setting up a court which is in its nature a criminal court, and we deny right to jury trial, a right granted to the meanest smuggler. The remedy this bill provides is of a criminal nature because there are important punishments and serious sanctions. The judge loses his job as it were, and is relegated to private life and disgraced. This is really a criminal proceeding, a criminal trial.

What do you do? You say to one of the judges, "You are guilty of misbehavior. You have not been behaving yourself." What in the world is good behavior? I do not know what good behavior is. No standard is set up in this bill. The commonest felon, when he is informed against or when an indictment is brought against him, must be charged with a specific crime, and the crime must be indicated specifically and succinctly. He must know unmistakenly and exactly of what he is accused. In this case you do not do that. You say that a man shall be answerable because he did not behave himself. Where lies the truth in this regard? I do not know. What is one man's meat is another man's poison. What may be good behavior to Green may be misbehavior to Lewis. Roosevelt today may be accused of an impeachable offense by one great class of people, and by another great class of people may be praised to the skies for the same activity.

I repeat, where does the truth lie? What is good behavior? What is the standard of good behavior? I maintain, therefore, this term is so indefinite that there is no due process, and every one of us is entitled to due process of law. This right is imbedded in the Constitution. If due process is not provided for in this bill the courts will undoubtedly frown upon it. What is due process?

In the case of United States v. Cohn Grocery Co. (256 U. S. 81) it was held that due process of the law requires that acts defining the offense should be specific enough so that its meaning could be determined from the law itself. The Court said:

> The Congress alone has the power to define crimes against the United States. This power cannot be delegated to the courts or juries of the country.

We cannot, therefore, delegate this power to circuit judges to try a particular judge who is accused in this indefinite, vague way.

> Therefore, because the law is vague, indefinite, and uncertain; and because it fixed no immutable standard of guilt but leaves such standard to the variant views of different courts and juries, one may be called upon to define it; and because it does not inform the defendant of the nature and cause of the accusations against him, I think it is constitutionally invalid, and the demurrer ought to be sustained.

This is important also. Every one of us should have the right to set up the defense of res adjudicata, namely, that we were accused of some crime or some offense and had been acquitted; but in this particular instance, of what have you been acquitted? You have been acquitted because you were good. Somebody else may bring another charge against you at some subsequent time based on the same state of facts. You cannot tell. The charges are too indefinite.

For these reasons, and many others which I shall put in the RECORD, I believe this is clearly and palpably unconstitutional. [Applause.]

I herewith insert some of my remarks from my minority report:

CONGRESS CANNOT LEGISLATE CONCERNING THE TERMS AND TENURE OF OFFICE OF THE JUDGES

This is purely a constitutional matter imbedded in the Constitution. The tenure of office for life during good behavior—anything that affects the tenure of the judges—must be as the Constitution dictates. It is not a matter of legislation. A trial for misbehavior, therefore, must be in pursuance of the Constitution.

INTENT OF FRAMERS OF CONSTITUTION CONCERNING OUSTER OF JUDGES

A study of the debates in the Constitutional Convention, and particularly those of Monday, August 27, 1787, clearly indicate that the framers of the Constitution intended only one method of ouster of judges, impeachment. It was on that day that they discussed the provision that judges should hold office during good behavior. Delegate Dickinson, of Delaware, proposed, as a method for removing judges, additional to impeachment, that they "may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and House of Representatives." (It is not recorded that he argued that what the Congress may do it may undo.) The champions of an independent judiciary were stirred to vigorous and immediate dissent. The proposal almost unanimously was voted down. (See Warren's The Making of the Constitution, 532.) Would not the framers of the Constitution have been surprised to learn that, themselves spurning an alternative of impeachment almost identical with it, unwittingly they had empowered Congress to adopt any alternative it chose.

The power to try judges, or remove them from office, would clearly be limited to impeachable offenses, under the general doctrine that where a constitution names certain things as constituting offenses, and gives specific powers with reference to certain subject matter, it is intended to be exclusive. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (eighth edition, p. 139), quotes this rule as follows:

"Another rule of construction is, that when the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition, or to extend the penalty to other cases."

The Supreme Court of Mississippi in State v. J. J. Henry (87 Mississippi Reports, 125; 40 Southern Reporter, 152), under clause (d) of the first syllabus, says:

"Where the Constitution enumerates power granted or denied, it must be held to have named all of the powers so dealt with and as being, with the necessary implications, the sole limit of authority or restriction."

To the same effect is the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts (12 Peters, 657; L. Ed. 1233) and Myers v. United States (272 U. S. 52; 71 L. Ed. 160).

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not presume I can make a logical argument in 10 minutes, if I were capable of making one; but this matter is now in such shape that I think a few desultory remarks may be in order on some of the things that seem to be misunderstood.

I do not think there is anything specially new or novel about this proceeding at all. I believe it is admitted by everyone who has thought about it that the words "good behavior" constitute and raise a justiciable issue. I think this is admitted.

It is further admitted that the proposed bill takes nothing from the power of Congress—takes nothing from the Senate and takes nothing from the House on the question of instituting impeachment proceedings or the Senate in trying impeachment proceedings. The only thing it does is that it initiates or sets up machinery whereby we may in fact judicially try the question of good behavior. Now, what do we mean by this? When a man is appointed to hold office during good behavior, he receives a life estate in that office subject to that condition precedent or subject to his good behavior.

This was the law in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The argument has been made here with respect to the necessity of preserving the independence of the judiciary. I do not think there is anybody in this House who wants to preserve the independence of the judiciary any more than I do, or will go any further than I will in preserving the independence of the judiciary.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Not right now, please.

But let me ask you this question: Is the judiciary of the United States any more independent than the judiciary of England? Is it not a well-known historical fact that the judiciary of England is probably the most independent judiciary of any country in the world? Now, what is the law in England and what was the law at the time the words "good behavior" were placed in this particular provision of the Constitution? The Acts of Settlement, passed in 1700, contains the words "good behavior", stating that the judges of the English courts shall hold office during good behavior.

Now, what was the law at that time as to how they might be removed, and how can they be removed now in England? Suppose a judge in England today is guilty of conduct that is not good behavior, how is he removed? There are four proceedings by which he may be removed. Understand, a so-called impeachment in England is just as effective as it is here. One is a proceeding by a writ resembling the writ of scire facias, and he is tried in a court. The commentators say that in a case of misconduct not amounting to a legal misdemeanor the appropriate course appears to be by scire facias to repeal the patent or to repeal that provision of the patent that has been issued to him, his commission to hold the office. The next is, when the conduct amounts to what a court might consider a misdemeanor, then by information in the courts. Third, if it amounts to an actual crime, then by impeachment. Fourth—and in all cases at the discretion of the Parliament—by the joint exercise of the inquisitorial jurisdiction by joint address.

Now, you talk about destroying the independence of the judiciary by the passage of this bill. You will not destroy the independence of the judiciary by doing this, but you will serve notice on every one of the members of the Federal judiciary that we simply expect them to make a reality out of the limitation on their tenure during good behavior. This is all you will do. You are not taking anything from these judges. You are not hampering them in the least, and you are not interfering with the free and untrammeled exercise of their duty.

It has been suggested by my distinguished friend from New York that if this law is passed there will be a flood of resolutions and there will be a number of trials. There will not be any such thing unless a judge ought to be tried. Do you think the House of Representatives would pass a resolution and put a man upon trial if we were not convinced he was guilty of conduct which was other than good behavior? Certainly, we would not, and on the other hand, suppose a man had committed a crime, a high crime or misdemeanor, what would happen? We would impeach him. Why would we impeach him? Because that kind of man not only ought to be removed from office under this section of the Constitution but the Senate ought to have the right to pass further judgment upon him, as provided by the Constitution, and bar him from ever holding another office of trust under the United States Government.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MILLER. Let me proceed just a little further, please.

The distinguished gentleman from New York pleads that we must protect the judiciary, and that to pass this resolution will be letting down the bars to Tom, Dick, and Harry to bring charges against them.

I do not know, but I do not think a majority of this House would ever place a district judge or any other judge of a court upon trial on any frivolous charges. It has not been done in England. We have given some serious consideration to this matter. The trouble about the whole thing is that in the average mind, and even the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] in his minority views said, that Federal judges hold office during life or during good behavior. That is just a common expression of a belief that has grown up. There is not anything mentioned about holding office for life. The distinguished gentleman further said that there were no dead words in the Constitution. I agree with him. There are no dead words in the Constitution. Good behavior means something. If it means something, where are we going to try the issue, and is it included in high crimes and misdemeanors or is it not a more comprehensive term? It is, and that is the point in this case. Good behavior is a wider term, because under the law in England at the time good behavior was put into our Constitution it included things that were not recognized under the English law as high crimes and misdemeanors, and therefore the writ of scire facias was applicable for removal of a judge for other than conduct of good behavior.

There is nothing wrong in this. Something was said in the minority views that intimated that this question was debated on the floor of the Convention. It was debated on the floor of the Convention, and I refer you to Mr. Madison's notes as my authority. When the tenure section was agreed upon, Mr. Dickinson proposed an amendment by adding the words "and may be removed by the Executive upon a joint address of the two Houses." That amendment was rejected, and Mr. Sherman said that would be all right if it were not for the fact that a joint address does not mean a trial. [Applause.] He was for a trial and that is provided for under the proposed bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, since February 5, when the President transmitted to this Congress his message relative to a proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, Nation-wide interest has been manifest concerning that branch of our Government that deals with the administration of justice. Senators, Representatives, public officials, bar associations, newspapers, and magazines have tendered approval or disapproval of the President's plan and our Constitution has been quoted, requoted, and misquoted with vehemence by partisans espousing both sides of the controversy that has been raging since that date. At the present time it appears as if the net results of that now famous contest will be a definite understanding of the power that the Executive shall exercise affecting the judiciary, and a liberal education accorded the people of the United States in constitutional law. Unfortunately, legislation at this session which would tend to strengthen and make more effective the administration of justice has not had the consideration it merited owing to the sensational attraction that has occupied the center of the stage.

The tumult and the shouting having somewhat subsided, I trust that the Congress will today give its favorable consideration to the bill introduced by the eminent chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary providing for trials and judgments upon the issue of good behavior in the case of certain Federal judges.

When the framers of our Constitution met in Philadelphia 150 years ago, they realized that public officers thereafter entrusted with the control of our Government would, after all, be human beings with all the faults, weaknesses, and frailties to which mankind is subject. Accordingly, they wrote into the fundamental law a provision that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" (art. II, sec. 4). They provided that "the House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment" (art. I, sec. 2) and that "the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury * * *" (art. III, sec. 2). They further provided that "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law (art. I, sec. 3).

And finally they provided that "the President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment" (art. II, sec. 2).

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. There, in my judgment, is a matter for at least serious thought upon my own part. The gentleman is reading the words of the Constitution about the judgment in impeachment cases.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. And the language is before the gentleman, that the judgment in impeachment cases shall be removal from office.

Mr. REED of Illinois. And it may be disqualification for holding office of honor thereafter.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes. The judgment in this proposed bill shall be only removal from office.

Mr. REED of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Here is a question I should like to have the gentleman's opinion on. Suppose we rendered a judgment of removal from office under this bill and then impeachment proceedings should be instituted and had and a conviction obtained, what would the gentleman think, for instance, of a plea of res adjudicata? The basis upon which a conviction and judgment can be entered in an impeachment proceeding is removal from office. If removal from office has already been effected, then would it be possible to render a complete and constitutional judgment in an impeachment proceeding?

Mr. REED of Illinois. I do not think impeachment would lie after removal from office, because there have been many times when impeachments have been commenced in the Senate and have been dismissed because of the constitutional question that you cannot remove a man from office when he is already out.

Mr. MASSINGALE. That is a matter explained somewhat differently by other members of the committee.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, these clauses of the Constitution which I have read are the sole and only provisions of that document that relate to impeachments, and constitute a means by which the President, Vice President, and all civil officers can be removed from office upon conviction of certain specified offenses, to wit: "Treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" (art. 11, sec. 4), by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment.

In the 150 years that the American people have enjoyed constitutional government 12 public officials have been brought to the bar of the Senate on charges preferred against them by the House of Representatives. Of these 12 persons, one was a President of the United States, one an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, one a Secretary of War, one a United States Senator, one a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and seven were United States district judges. Experience in these cases has taught us that trials by impeachment are long, cumbersome, and unsatisfactory. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the Senate was composed of 26 Members—one more than the present membership of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House. Several of the standing committees of this body today exceed in number the total membership of the United States Senate of that period. The addition of new States has swelled its membership to 96, an unwieldy body to sit and act, as it must in impeachment trials, as both a court and jury. It is composed of busy men, who cannot and will not divest themselves of the time they must necessarily devote to their lawmaking activities and concentrate, analyze, and digest the intricate testimony offered and evidence adduced in an impeachment trial. They are legislators rather than jurists. Except in cases involving high public officials they should not be required to set aside their legislative duties, paralyzing for weeks the lawmaking function of our Government, and don the robes of a judicial tribunal. It is an imposition to require them to sit in judgment on proceedings to oust a Federal district judge when matters of vastly greater importance should occupy their time and energies. As a court and jury acting under these handicaps they render fair and impartial justice to neither the accused nor the accuser.

Roger Foster in his Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States said:

> Impeachment trials are a survival of the earliest kinds of jurisprudence, when all cases were tried before an assembly of the citizens of the tribe or State. Later, ordinary cases, both civil and criminal were assigned to courts created for that purpose but matters of great public importance were still reserved for a decision of the whole body of citizens or subsequently of the council of elders, heads of families or holders of fiefs."

Surely now, after 150 years, when our Nation has grown in population from 3,929,214 to 128,429,000 souls, when it has expanded from 13 to 48 sovereign States, when its domain stretches from the Atlantic Ocean on the east to the Pacific on its west, when its trade and commerce have increased a millionfold, when its citizens have had the rich experience of a century and a half of self-government, it would seem advisable, if permitted by the basic law of the land to discard an archaic and cumbersome mode of discharging unworthy and incompetent minor officials from the public service for a better method that would be more simple, efficient, and just.

But let us look again to the Constitution. Section 1 of article III says, "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior * * *." This necessarily means that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. It means that the tenure of their offices is determined by their own personal and official conduct. If they misbehave their actions in so doing create a justiciable issue to be passed upon in a manner prescribed by law. Some tribunal must determine whether the actions of the accused judge were of such a nature as to constitute misconduct and if so, that his tenure of office has expired by his own misdeeds.

But some will say "What is good behavior? This bill doesn't define it. What is good behavior to one man may be bad behavior to another." My answer to that inquiry would be to propound another. "What is good behavior now under the Constitution? And what is the meaning of 'high crimes and misdemeanors'? What is the definition of 'fraud', 'due process of law', and 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?'" These are general terms, and there has never been a court or a legislator that has had the wisdom to be able to state a definition of these terms in language capable of including every possible state of facts, and write it into the law of the land.

An eminent former member of this body who was one of the managers on the part of the House in an impeachment proceeding some years ago in defining "high crimes and misdemeanors" to the Senate said:

> Mr. President, * * * outside of the language of the Constitution * * * there is no law which binds the Senate in this case today except the law which is prescribed by their own conscience, and on that and on that alone, must depend the result of this trial. Each Senator must fix his own standard; and the result of this trial depends upon whether or not these offenses we have charged * * * come within the law laid down by the conscience of each Senator for himself.

Can it be said that a court composed of legally trained jurists is less capable of passing upon the admissibility of evidence and the merits of a case involving the right of a judge to continue in an office he is alleged to have disgraced than a group of legislators many of whom are not trained in law? An innocent judge would prefer to be tried by his colleagues.

Let us look again at the Constitution and let us suppose for the moment that all of the provisions thereof that relate to impeachments had been omitted therefrom. Judges would still hold office only "during good behavior." Can it be said that these words have no meaning and that they are dead words in the Constitution? I think not. They are not self-executing. They require enabling legislation to give them vitality. They have lain dormant for 150 years because Congress chose to proceed by the more cumbersome method. The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibited the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, but this amendment, too, would have remained a dead provision of the fundamental law if Congress and the several States had not enacted legislation to make it operative.

It has been pointed out that judges are not appointed for life but merely during "good behavior", and it has been said that these words must be construed with the "high crimes and misdemeanor" clause in the impeachment section. Most authorities admit that there is little, if any, difference in the meaning of the two terms. It is plainly apparent that the President, Vice President, and all civil officers—which includes judges—may be removed from office by impeachment. The terms of the President and Vice President are 4 years. Yet their tenure of office can be terminated by a judgment of the United States Senate that they have been guilty of the offenses specified in the Constitution. Does not the same thing apply to judges, even though their term of office is not fixed definitely? Suppose our forefathers in the Constitutional Convention had fixed the tenure of judges at "life" instead of "during good behavior", as was at one time proposed. Would they not be removable by impeachment just the same as they are now? Would the insertion of the word "life" in place of the words "during good behavior" make one single iota of difference in the trial of judges by impeachment? Why, then, was there an exception placed in the Constitution as to judges as compared with other civil officers? Perhaps an uncanny insight into the future led the framers of the fundamental law of our land to believe that the less the legislative or executive branches of our Government had to do with the removal of judges the more independent they would be in their judgments. Senators and Representatives may be expelled by their colleagues for good cause. The Executive may remove his subordinates if they are dishonest or inefficient. Why should the courts not possess the same power?

The bill under consideration is merely an exercise by Congress of its legislative power to "constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court" and to "make laws • • • necessary and proper for carrying into execution" its constitutional prerogatives (art. I, sec. 8).

Briefly, this proposed legislation provides that upon the passage of a proper resolution by the House of Representatives stating that in the opinion of the House any Federal district judge has been guilty of misbehavior within the meaning of section I of article 3 of the Constitution, the Chief Justice of the United States shall convene or cause to be convened the circuit court of appeals of the circuit in which the judicial district of the judge is situated in a special term for the trial of the issue of good behavior of such judge. It provides that judges of other circuits may be called by the Chief Justice to sit on said court; that the Attorney General shall prosecute on behalf of the United States; and that the judgment of the court, in case of conviction, shall be that the judge is removed from office. It provides for an appeal from that judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States and that the judgment of that tribunal shall be final and binding.

It assures both the accuser and the accused of a trial before a tribunal that is judicially minded and learned in the law.

It relieves the United States Senate of the burden of constituting itself as a court at the sacrifice of its legislative duties.

It accomplishes everything that is contemplated by impeachment but does it efficiently and impartially.

It surrenders none of the rights now existing to try judges by the impeachment method if Congress so prefers.

It gives the courts the opportunity to purge themselves of those who are unworthy.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, this is one of the most constructive measures that has been proposed at this session of Congress, and I trust it will receive the enthusiastic support of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. TOLAN].

Mr. TOLAN. This is indeed a large question to discuss in the short time of 5 minutes, but shall do the best I can. When this legislation was first mentioned I was not in favor of it, but having served on the Judiciary Committee with our great chairman, Mr. SUMNERS—and by the way he is one of the great constitutional lawyers in the United States, if not the greatest—he finally persuaded me that he is right. Men, and particularly lawyers, are so married to precedents that it takes a mental crowbar to pry them loose. We have been going along here for 150 years saying that the only remedy for removal of judges is by impeachment. I call attention to a fact that probably has not been brought out today. Do you Members realize that the constitution of every State in the Union provides for impeachment of various officials of States, and that by statute in nearly every State in this Union we have independent remedies such as accusation and others where the sole issue tried is the question of removal from office and this trial is by the court and independent of impeachment and criminal proceedings. For instance, the Attorney General of the United States was mentioned. The attorney general of the State of California has a perfect right to file an accusation against the secretary of the treasury in that State and remove him, independent of impeachment. There you have it in the States of the Union. That is all we are asking here now.

Let me say another thing, if I may. I do not know all about this by any means, and I answer this proposition on account of someone mentioning that this legislation was an attack on the judiciary. Do you mean to tell me that the judiciary of the United States would not rather be tried in a court where the judges will listen to the evidence and look into their faces? Would you not, as a judge, rather be tried before three judges of the circuit court of appeals than to be tried before the Senate of the United States? This is no disparagement of the Senate, because they have other work to do; but would you not rather be tried before three judges of the circuit court than before the Senate and have 4 or 5 Members out of 96 listen to the testimony and decide upon your fate? I certainly think you would. When the framers of the Constitution said the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may provide, and that the judges shall hold office during good behavior, and that their salaries shall not be diminished during their continuance in office, nothing was mentioned about impeachment, and it means that judges can hold office just so long as they behave themselves. It means the judiciary has the right to purge itself by removing its members when they are guilty of misbehavior. Why is that so? The President of the United States can remove officers under him. He is the executive branch. He does not have to impeach them. A Member of the House of Representatives can be removed without being impeached.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield the gentleman from California 1 additional minute.

Mr. TOLAN. So the House of Representatives can purge itself of a Member who has been guilty of misbehavior, and this without impeachment. The Senate can do it without impeachment. The executive branch can do it. Therefore why cannot a Federal judge be removed without impeachment?

I think this is a constitutional measure, very meritorious legislation, and hope you will support it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HOBBS. Certainly.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who is yielding time on this side is yielding much of the time to those in favor of the bill. As a member of the committee, I do not like that kind of treatment.

Mr. GUYER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I gave him time but neglected to mark it on my pad. I will yield him time later.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, in order to relieve the embarrassment, I yield back to the gentleman from Kansas the time he so kindly gave me, in order that the gentleman from Michigan or anyone else who cares to may oppose the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. How much time is there left on that side?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Forty-one minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. And the gentleman on our side has yielded most of the time to those in favor of the bill.

Mr. HOBBS. I have relieved that embarrassment.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will try to keep within the 5 minutes, because I have already cluttered up the RECORD with my views on this subject. On Thursday I put some remarks in the RECORD in opposition to the bill, thinking it was coming up on Friday when I could not be present. But let me briefly make a résumé of my arguments against the bill before us.

In the first place, I am afraid I have one of those immature minds referred to by our genial chairman, which cannot find in article III any authority for the removal of a Federal judge from office. If article I did not exist, the article in which the House is given sole authority to impeach and the Senate the sole power to try impeachment cases, and if article II did not exist, which states the grounds on which a civil officer may be removed, then I think I could find in article III some authority for setting up a tribunal to try the issue of good behavior; but as I look at it, when you use such general language as the good behavior clause of section I, article III for authority to remove a judge from office, you must look elsewhere in the Constitution for specific grounds of removal and the procedure to be followed. The vague ambiguous language of article III is limited by the definite provisions of article I and article II.

It was not any oversight or carelessness that made it difficult to remove judges from office. The framers of the Constitution made every possible effort to make judges independent and secure in their tenure of office. They knew that popular rulers sometimes become despots and they knew, too, that legislative bodies frequently become the rubber stamps of the Executive; so they safeguarded the judiciary as a separate and coordinate branch of Government by freeing them from unconsequential charges and assuring them of fair trials by the direct representatives of the people. Waiving the question of constitutionality, is it wise to enact such a law as this at the present time when there is a spirit of lawlessness and revolution in the land? Is it wise to put on the statute books what must be construed as an attack on the courts? Is it going to give aid and comfort to those who are opposed to our form of Government? When the judiciary is no longer independent we will have no protection against fascism, communism, despotism, absolutism, and the other isms which are so repugnant to Americanism. The framers deliberately set up safeguards for the judiciary of this country.

Have you read the bill carefully? Please read the first page at least. It states that the House of Representatives may pass a resolution stating that in its opinion reasonable grounds exist for believing that Judge So-and-so's conduct or behavior has been other than good behavior within the meaning of section 1 of article III. This bill purports to provide the causes and method of removing Federal judges entirely independent of any law or constitutional provision except section 1 of article III. What is there in that section which defines good behavior? There is no hint as to what good behavior might be, or bad behavior, or fair behavior. This bill would leave the judges open to attack on the most trivial charges. It would make it possible for a hysterical or prejudiced House of Representatives to attack and harrass every honest courageous judge in the judiciary, and to intimidate all the rest of them. It is extremely unwise to have such a bill on the books at this time. It constitutes a very definite threat to the independence of the court, without which democracy cannot survive.

The third question I have in mind is whether such a bill is necessary to accomplish the change which our distinguished chairman seeks. I know that it is not even remotely in his mind to weaken the court. He does feel, however, that an impeachment trial is a burdensome, lengthy, awkward, unsatisfactory method of trying judges for misconduct. We agree with him in all that. I want to call attention to the fact that this bill does not offer the sole remedy for obtaining the reform which the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary seeks to accomplish. He himself has suggested another means of reaching his objective, constitutional, satisfactory, and fair. Since the Senate sits as a court, it has the power of a court to appoint what might be likened to a referee, or a special master in a court of law to hear evidence and make findings. Through such a procedure it would not be necessary to take up the 2 or 3 weeks' time of the Senate that the average impeachment trial requires while other public business is delayed. It is entirely within the power of the Senate to delegate to a special master, namely, a committee of its own making, the duty to hear whatever evidence it thinks necessary, to make a determination and report, on which the Senate would take final action.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, not to pass this bill hastily or without serious thought and a realization of its implications. There is a grave question as to its constitutionality; the bill contains language under which some future House, elected on a wave of prejudice or temporary emotion, could persecute honest judges when the country needs them most; if the objective is to save the Senate from the duty of remaining in session for long periods to hear the evidence in impeachment trials, that purpose can be accomplished in another way. The potentialities of this bill, taken in connection with recent developments in this country, seriously threaten the permancy of American institutions.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, before I begin a discussion of this most important and wise piece of legislation, a manifestation of the real statesmanship of the author of the bill, I cannot refrain, even though the time be limited, from pausing to pay tribute to him whom I consider one of the major prophets of constitutional law in this Nation—yea, in the world today—the gentleman from Texas, the Honorable HATTON W. SUMNERS. [Applause.]

My distinguished colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], asks: "Where does the truth lie?" He reiterates it both in his minority report and on the floor three times here today. It gives me pleasure to point to the majority report, penned by HATTON SUMNERS, and to answer the question by saying, "There is the truth with respect to this matter." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in common with many of you, I love the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, but that is not the reason that I am for this bill. I have the utmost confidence in his legal opinion on any subject, but that is not the reason I am for this bill. I think it marvelous that we have with us today as the author of this bill the only man, living or dead, who has ever participated in three impeachment trials before the Senate of the United States; and, therefore, I the more respect his judgment; but that is not why I am for this bill. I glory, however, in the fact that the cause we are pleading for here today is led by such a man, a man in whose integrity of thought and judgment this House may well repose the utmost confidence. [Applause.]

It seems to me perfectly true that the experience we have had with impeachment in these 150 years of our national existence has abundantly proven that there is no need of a 16-inch gun to shoot the twig from under a sparrow! We laboriously load, we shoot, and the twig falls, once in a while. The sparrow flies away to other fields. But such a big cannon is absolutely unnecessary and a waste of time, effort, and ammunition.

We respectfully submit that in this bill there is a better way. A smaller gun with a surer aim has been devised by the master mind who heads this committee, and it is presented for your acceptance or rejection today.

I want to emphasize again that this bill does not mean change of one jot or one tittle of the law of impeachment. Not if we would, could we, and we would not if we could, change one syllable of the impeachment power. We take nothing away from this House. The same deliberation must be a condition precedent to this mode of procedure that there is to the other, but we say to the House that after a complaint has been made by a responsible person and after the Judiciary Committee of the House has weighed it on the scales of its judgment with the utmost of its scrupulous care, we will then report to the House what we think on the subject.

Then the House has the choice of the two roads.

Is it a matter of such moment to the Nation that the usual functions of Senate and Senators should be paralyzed for weeks? Is it of such importance that we should pay, as we did in the Louderback case, from $500 to $1,000 per witness to bring them across the continent from San Francisco? Or shall we designate three judges to go to San Francisco and there sit and try the case and dispose of it in an orderly and expeditious manner?

In my judgment, the first great reason for the enactment of this bill is for the sake of the bench; for the sake of the men who are now adorning the woolsack, who lend glory to the administration of justice in this country.

Not 1 percent of the occupants of the bench of the district courts of the United States have ever disgraced themselves, or their office, or brought the administration of justice into disrepute. For those honored judges the ninety and nine percent, I plead, in the first place, for the enactment of this bill. We need a more expeditious, a more certain remedy than that which is provided in the impeachment power. I want to say today that which I think needs to be said, that in all of the history of the American Nation there has been only one conviction of a district judge of the United States in a contested impeachment trial. We have had 150 years of experience. One hundred and fifty years are gone and with all of the hundreds of complaints that have been registered in that time, only 12 impeachment trials have been ordered by this House. There have been two convictions of judges in contested cases, one of a judge of the Court of Commerce and the other a district judge.

Am I critical of the Senate? No. The next reason I am for this bill is for the sake of the Senate. The Senators need the relief which this bill gives them. When the Constitution was written that body had only 26 Members. If my recollection be correct, there were then only 15 district judges in the United States. Now we have 96 Senators and 154 United States district judges. Each district judge at that time loomed large on the national horizon because of the fewness of their number. Now they are lost in the crowd, so to speak.

This bill might well be entitled: "For the relief of the Senate." We come before you and ask that some relief be given to that august body that has measured up splendidly under the handicaps with which it has contended. It has done as much of its duty as those men, who have always been worthy to sit in the seats of the mighty, have been able to perform, as beset as they are with public business and other official duties.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. According to the present practice the Senate does not hear the evidence. Is it not the rule that only a very few Senators hear the evidence, usually members of the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. HOBBS. I think that is so.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Would it not be just as satisfactory for the Senate to designate a committee of its own to hear the evidence outside the Senate Chamber and thus save the time of the Senate? There would be more justice. You would not delay public business and you would be within the Constitution. Does not the gentleman believe that?

Mr. HOBBS. I believe that with all my heart and I made a speech along that line 2 years ago. But may I say in response to the inquiry that I do not think such a practice would be in the class with this remedy in satisfaction. I believe this is infinitely better.

Let me hasten to a discussion of the constitutionality of this bill. Is it constitutional? You have every bit of the law in the world right here on this blackboard. That is all there is. Someone has injected into this debate—I think it was the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT]—the question as to whether or not if we struck out the words "during good behavior" and substituted "for life", the power of impeachment would apply. He says we could not use impeachment if the tenure of office was definitely fixed. How about the tenure of office of the President of the United States? Is there anything indefinite about 4 years? The Constitution says he shall hold office for 4 years. It does not say anything about good behavior in his tenure, and yet we impeached a President and came within one vote of convicting him.

I think that is a full and complete answer to the gentleman's objection. We can impeach even though the tenure is fixed and definite. That is the only place in the Constitution where you will find any good behavior clause, and the reason for it is that the members of the Constitutional Convention knew the time would come when there would be a statesman of the caliber and stature of HATTON W. SUMNERS who would bring life to a provision which they wrote in the Constitution and work out a constitutional method of enabling the judiciary to purge itself.

They talk about the doctrine of expressio unius, exclusio est alterius, a lot of Latin which in this connection means nothing. The Supreme Court of the United States nine different times has held it not applicable in the connection here contended for. Here are the words of the Constitution: "The President, Vice President, and all civil officers." That includes judges. Therefore, if there be any civil officer who can be removed from office withcut impeachment, their logic and that argument falls, does it not?

The Supreme Court of the United States has nine different times held that there are civil officers who may be ousted without impeachment—Myers against United States, Wallace against United States, Shurtleff against United States, Parsons against United States, and Blake against United States. All were civil officers appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Supreme Court of the United States held that without consulting the Senate, without consulting any person whomsover, the President could, ex mero motu, kick them out.

Heads of departments have power to remove their appointees, as decided in United States versus Perkins and Keim versus United States. Courts of law have the same power, as decided in Ex parte Hennen and Reagan against United States.

I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] one question. Does the gentleman think the framers of the Constitution were dumb? Of course he does not. The gentleman knows they knew what they were talking about and doing.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman want me to answer?

Mr. HOBBS. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Of course they were not dumb.

Mr. HOBBS. They knew their business.

Mr. CELLER. They knew their business, and we must realize they knew their business. Therefore, when they said the Senate shall be the sole tribunal to try impeachments and the House shall be the sole power to bring the impeachment we should abide by what they said. This is the only method they wrote into the Constitution.

Mr. HOBBS. I will answer that in just a minute, but I am asking the gentleman if the framers meant to say this method of impeachment was to be the sole method of removal from office, then why, in God's name, did they not say so?

Mr. CELLER. They did say so, beyond question.

Mr. HOBBS. Where is it? I challenge that statement. I demand the proof. If the gentleman proves it, I will vote against the bill. The gentleman cannot prove it, because there is not a word in the Constitution such as he states. I demand the proof or retraction.

Mr. CELLER. I shall be glad to give to the gentleman if the gentleman will yield the balance of his time to me.

Mr. HOBBS. I yield nothing, and I demand proof of what the gentleman has just stated. I say there is no truth in it. There is not a word in the Constitution to support such a statement.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. No; I cannot yield. I am sorry. I have only 3 minutes.

Of the five methods of ouster known to the English common law, which is in large part the law of America today, this method of impeachment was given to Congress when the Constitution was written. Why? It had to be put into the Constitution because it was a ceding to the legislative branch of the Government of a power over both the executive and judicial branches, and without this express grant no vestige of any such power could even be claimed. I cite you to the Myers case and to the latest pronouncement of the Supreme Court in the Humphreys case, where the coordinate and separate functions of the three coordinate branches of the Government are stressed, and where that doctrine of separation is laid down.

In conclusion, may I say this bill is the only hope of the judiciary. It is the only hope of this Nation to survive as a democracy. It is the hope of the administration of justice. Justice must be kept pure. It is not only for the sake of the judges, but for the sake of the Nation, and for the perpetuity of our democratic institutions that we are pleading today. The spring from which the stream of justice flows must be pure. All men should be able, confidently, to drink therefrom, tasting the sweetness of its purity, while slaking the thirst of their souls for the essence of truth, for righteousness saturated with mercy.

I beg of you your most earnest consideration, not in a partisan spirit, but in a spirit of statesmanship, for we are challenging you to the long view, the high view. Opportunity knocks at your door today. You have a chance to strike a blow for the salvation of the soul of our institutions and the administration of justice. [Applause.]

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, it is, indeed, in a spirit of temerity that I venture to express my views about the constitutionality or the advisability of enacting this bill into law. I say temerity, because the chairman of the committee has vouchsafed that all of the good lawyers of the country are agreed as to its constitutionality. Now, of course, I do not claim to be a constitutional lawyer or a good lawyer of any other variety, but in my judgment there is more than serious doubt as to the constitutionality of this measure.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I hope the chairman of the committee will excuse me, because my time is so limited.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will yield the gentleman 1 minute. I simply want to say that I take it all back. I did not know how the gentleman stood. [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHENER. The chairman is always a courteous gentleman. I admire him much. However, I think possibly he does "overstate himself" a mite when he indicates that there is a unanimity of opinion in the legal profession as to the constitutionality of this bill.

The gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, has to my personal knowledge been giving serious study and doing much work on this subject for more than 10 years. He feels that under the present law the procedure providing for the removal of Federal judges from office is too cumbersome, and he has been casting about in an effort to discover the solution. I was associated with the gentleman from Texas as one of the managers on the part of the House in the impeachment case of Judge English, of the eastern district of Illinois, in 1926. I, too, realize some of the difficulties under the present system. I, too, have given considerable thought to proposed remedies. I think my mind ran along with that of the chairman in this regard until he discovered this hidden power in the Constitution. The study of the chairman has made it possible for him to discover a latent power in the Constitution which this bill attempts to vitalize. In other words, in language that will be well understood by old-time Methodists, we have both been at the mourners' bench seeking light. At last the chairman has received the revelation while, possibly unfortunately, the spirit has not yet made itself manifest to me. I realize that in these days it is sometimes difficult to maintain a consistent position and, at the same time, keep pace with the times. Possibly my mind is not flexible enough to grasp modern-day interpretations of our Constitution. The truth is that I have grown up in that school respecting the Constitution and the fundamental things for which it stands, and I know that in that instrument is the only place where we find the rights, freedom, and liberty of our people written in plain words. There is the guaranty.

I have great respect and admiration for the chairman's legal opinion and his well-thought-out conclusions. The fact that I cannot always agree with him possibly indicates that I am sometimes wrong. Maybe the whole world is out of step on this thing but me. However, be that as it may, I am willing to proffer several suggestions.

The Congress can be engaged in no more serious or fundamental work than the impeachment or removal from office of the judiciary. The importance of the task warrants solemnity of treatment. As we approach the consideration of this measure two questions necessarily present themselves.

First, has the Congress the constitutional power to do that which is contemplated?

Second, is the policy embarked upon in this bill desirable and advisable?

In reaching an answer to the first question it is well that we have before us the pertinent provisions of the Constitution, which are as follows:

Section 2 of article I of the Constitution provides that—

> The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Section 3 of article I provides that—

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

Section 4 of article II provides that—

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Section 1 of article III provides that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

It is conceded by the proponents of this bill that section 4 of article II cannot in any way be changed or altered by congressional action without constitutional amendment. Therefore the Federal judges are civil officers within the meaning of the Constitution and removable by impeachment. Regardless of any legislation enacted by Congress, the right to impeach Federal judges remains in the Senate. That is admitted.

It is the contention, however, that section 1 of article III limits the tenure of office of the Federal judiciary to a term "during good behavior", and that article III has no relation whatever to section 4 of article II, but that in the judicial section another method is provided for removing these "civil officers." The chairman of the committee says "this is to be a suit by the United States against a judge for violating the conditions of his contract" and that the question of good behavior is a justiciable issue and, therefore, can be tried and disposed of by the judiciary. The bill goes so far as to provide that the prosecution shall be by the Attorney General, the legal arm of the executive department, and shall be before a court selected by the Chief Justice, who is appointed by the Executive, from the circuit court of appeals of the district in which the accused judge resides. The most appealing thing about this proposal is its novelty. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], who has just preceded me, would have us believe that the framers of the Constitution intended that members of the judiciary might be removed by impeachment but, at the same time, they tucked away in article III a concurrent or an additional power to do the same job. He indicates in his argument that the Constitutional Convention—> knew the time would come when there would be a statesman of the caliber and stature of HATTON W. SUMNERS, who would bring life to a provision which they wrote in the Constitution, and work out a constitutional method of enabling the judiciary to purge itself.

In view of what actually happened in the Constitutional Convention, I find no warrant for Judge HOBBS' conclusion.

Alexander Hamilton, one of the framers of the Constitution, in The Federalist (no. LXXIX) speaking about the judiciary, wrote:

> This independence of judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals * * *. The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachments. They are liable to be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives, and tried by the Senate, and if convicted may be dismissed from office and disqualified from holding any other. This is the only provision on the point, which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character, and is the only one which I find in our own Constitution in respect to our own judges.

I doubt not that further evidence is obtainable indicating that the Constitutional Convention intended that judges should be removed by impeachment only, and had no idea that 150 years after the adoption of the Constitution, in the name of expediency, a microscopic examination of the Constitution would bring to light a hidden power, always present but never visible, whereby a short cut might be adopted to remove from the judiciary members whose conduct was other than good.

I listened with much interest to the constitutional argument made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GWYNNE], and for the additional reasons given by him I do not believe that the Congress has the power to deprive a member of the judiciary from trial by the impeachment court, as above indicated. If this were a new question, that would be different, but the master legal minds for more than a century and a half have given study to the same proposition, and up to this time none have been bold enough to contend that this type of legislation is constitutional. A well-established practice, based upon precedent, is now available as a guide in the trial of impeachment cases. There is no difficulty in understanding what treason or bribery comprehend, but there has been question as to whether or not behavior other than good behavior constitutes "high crimes and misdemeanors" within the meaning of section 4 of article II. This question, however, has finally been settled as expressed by the late Chief Justice Taft, speaking before the American Bar Association in 1913, when he said:

> Under authoritative construction by the highest court of impeachment, the Senate of the United States, a high misdemeanor for which a judge may be removed is misconduct involving bad faith or wantonness or recklessness in his judicial actions, or in the use of his official influence for ulterior purposes. By the liberal interpretation of the term "high misdemeanor" which the Senate has given there is now no difficulty in securing the removal of a judge for any reason that shows him unfit.

It seems strange that the late Chief Justice, in his study of the Constitution in connection with the removal of Federal judges for misbehavior, overlooked this power which is here proclaimed.

The chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], the principal proponents of this innovation, have presented no court decisions in support of their contention as to the constitutionality. Mr. HOBBS tells us: "You have every bit of the law in the world right here" in section 4 of article II and in article III of the Constitution on this proposition. We are told this is pioneering; therefore let us apply common sense in the light of what the framers of the Constitution did and said at the time, not forgetting the interpretation accepted, practiced, followed, and believed to be the law for the last 150 years.

There is another thing that makes this procedure impossible to me. Section 1 of article III provides that—

> The judges, both of the Supreme and the inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

I repeat this language to call your attention to the fact that "the Supreme and the inferior courts" are treated as a class and as a group, and it is my judgment that even though the Congress had the right to create another inferior court for the purpose of deciding the justiciable question of good behavior, the Constitution does not give power to set up one type of standard of good behavior for Supreme judges and circuit judges and another type of behavior for district judges. If this article of the Constitution gives the Congress power to do what is here claimed, it surely requires a uniform law and procedure as to all judges coming within the class enumerated. Particular attention is called to the punctuation in article III.

Bear in mind that no definition of good behavior is to be found in this bill, and its proponents will refuse to accept any amendments attempting to set up any standards. Yet it is insisted that punishment shall be meted out to a judge whose conduct does not meet the approbation of the specific tribunal happening to be called to determine his case. If this same judge was charged with murder, embezzlement, or robbery, the statutes would define the crime. The court would have a yardstick or guidebook. Here all is left to the discretion of the particular forum operating on the particular judge. Is this reasonable or constitutional? If the Congress can do this, then it can create any partisan court it sees fit to try the judge. The forefathers never intended anything of the sort. Just a resolution by the House that there is reasonable cause to believe that the conduct is not good is all that is necessary.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. HOBBS. To ask if the accused under such a case as would be made under this bill would not have the time-honored right, as every other accused has had, of demanding a bill of particulars?

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know and the gentleman does not know. Under the bill he would not. He would have no rights. Congress provides nothing. He is turned over to a tribunal to be tried with authority in that tribunal to make rules and regulations.

Mr. HOBBS. And to ask further if there has been any proceeding in impeachment yet where the accused has not always been granted a bill of particulars.

Mr. MICHENER. We are not dealing with impeachment. A code of rules, or a practice has grown up in the Senate and has been established, and we have there a set practice.

If we should find that there is constitutional warrant for this legislation, then we must give consideration to the question as to whether or not its enactment at this time is desirable and advisable.

That this measure is prompted by expediency can hardly be controverted. The gentleman from Alabama complains that throughout the preceding 150 years only 12 impeachments have been ordered by the House, and there have been only two convictions in the Senate. It is said that the time of the Senate is too valuable to be toyed away in determining whether or not a United States district judge has misbehaved. It is also insisted by the gentleman that even though the proposed bill only requires the House to pass a resolution that there is reasonable cause to believe that a judge's conduct is bad, the House in each case will prepare specifications the same as under the impeachment procedure. I agree that this is a possibility but not a requirement.

If the specifications are prepared, however, and the House passes on these cases, the same as it does in impeachment cases, then the gentleman's argument in one particular fails, because there is no reason to believe that future Houses will act differently than past Houses. At the same time it is insisted that the Senate is too busy and that it will not give consideration to the cases, and therefore will not impeach. Special reference has been made to the Louderback and Ritter cases, with which cases the present Congress is familiar. The vote in the House on the Louderback case was 183 for impeachment and 142 against impeachment. The vote in the House on the Ritter case was 181 for impeachment and 146 against impeachment. There was some doubt in the House. It requires a two-thirds vote in the Senate to convict. Louderback was acquitted. Ritter was acquitted on each specific count; and then, giving the most liberal interpretation to the term "good behavior", was convicted of misbehavior on the theory that the sum total of the things charged against him brought his high office into disrepute. It has been argued here that it should not require a 16-inch gun to remove a district judge from the bench, and that this bill provides "a smaller gun with a surer aim."

Mr. GUYER. He also said the caliber was too big.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; he said the Senate caliber was too big.

In view of this debate, I am just wondering what the real purpose of this bill is. In one breath we are told that present impeachment is too cumbersome; in another breath that the time of the Senate is too valuable to be wasted on such minor matters; in another breath that this bill, if enacted into law, will "purge the bench of those few who still disgrace it by dishonesty and corruption"; in another breath that this measure is necessary "to protect the honest judiciary of this country against being smeared up by a little handful of crooks that ought to be off the bench."

If there are crooks, corrupt and dishonest judges on the bench at this time, if these facts are known to Members of Congress, then it would seem to be their duty to proceed, giving the facts to the House, invoking the power of impeachment, and let the House vote upon these specific charges, and then let the Senate discharge its duty as the high Court of Impeachment.

If the effect of this bill is to make it easy to threaten, intimidate, and impeach district judges, then I am sure that we should all be opposed to it. If there are corrupt judges serving at this time, and we have knowledge of that fact, there is no justification in waiting for a supplemental law to try the cases. We have the machinery now.

If there is a shorter, more expeditious, legal, and just method of examining and determining the question of misbehavior on the part of Federal judges, then we all want to adopt that method. We do not want to indulge in any doubtful experiments or resort to a rule of trial and error at this particular time. The courts should have the confidence of the country, and the House should do everything within its power to guarantee integrity in the courts.

I appreciate the importance of this measure, but I cannot agree with my good friend, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] when he says, "In conclusion, may I say this bill is the only hope of the judiciary. It is the only hope of the Nation to survive as a democracy."

In times like these we need honest, courageous judges just the same as we need honest, courageous legislators and executives. The decisions of the courts cannot please everyone. There are always two sides to a lawsuit. There always has been and there always will be disgruntled litigants yelping at the heels of courageous courts. We may be able to simplify the procedure of impeachment but there can be no substitute. A trial by the Senate and a two-thirds vote cannot be superseded by a trial by a statutory creation and a majority vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, not being a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I was not familiar with the discussions held in that committee, but I have listened very attentively all afternoon to the arguments made on the floor, and certain questions have arisen in my mind which have not yet been answered. I trust some member of the committee can enlighten me in regard to those questions.

When Judge Ritter was tried I attended some of the hearings. I became convinced, as must everyone else who attended that trial, that no judge, under the present system of impeachment, could possibly have a fair and impartial trial. Judge Ritter did not have it, and I do not think any other judge ever could get it, because the jury absents itself from the room during the trial, and that would make a mistrial in any court in any jurisdiction in the United States. Yet that is what occurs in the Senate during an impeachment trial. So when this measure was brought in I felt greatly relieved that something was being devised that might bring about a fairer, more just, more equitable method of trying judges whose conduct was in question.

Let me point out to you what occurs to me as something that ought to be considered. Let us say that the House impeaches a district judge, that it certifies this resolution to the Chief Justice, calling upon him to constitute a court of three circuit judges to try this man, and they proceed under this law, conceding for the moment that it is constitutional, and that at the same time a hostile Senate of the United States, jealous of its prerogatives, proceeds to try this man under impeachment proceedings, as it is conceded it has a perfect right to do. The three judges of the circuit court find him guilty of misconduct and misbehavior and unfit for the bench, while the Senate of the United States, constitutionally created, finds him not guilty. What is he, guilty or not guilty? As far as I can see there is no method under the present bill which would obviate such a situation arising.

One more thing. Everyone is entitled to a trial by jury. I am a firm believer in the right of trial by jury. Even a common bootlegger has the right to trial by jury, and the verdict of a jury of 12 of his peers must be unanimous to find him guilty of the offense with which he is charged. Yet here is a judge of a district court who may be tried by only three men, and they may find him guilty and mark him for life, bring his name down into eternal disgrace, on the judgment of what? Of two of these judges, or unanimously? We do not know from the bill. In the case of the Senate, its verdict must be by two-thirds of those sitting. This bill does not say whether a two-thirds vote on the judge being tried is sufficient. Let us concede that it is. Then he is to be found guilty and marked for life by the votes of two men. I cannot lend myself to that kind of a trial. I am opposed to it. I would at least give him an equal chance with the bootlegger.

I am satisfied that the bill is unconstitutional. Section 1, article III, relates only to the terms of the judges and their compensation, while section 4, article II, relates to the method of removal of all civil officers.

Another objection to the bill is the fact that it gives no definition of what constitutes bad behavior. Is drunkenness off the bench and not in a public place misbehavior? If a judge off the bench voices his opinion against war, is he misbehaving? If a judge off the bench bets on a horse race or a ball game, has he misbehaved? To some people these actions constitute grave offenses, to others they are not sufficient grounds for removal.

Another serious objection is found on page 2, lines 21 and 22. I read from the bill:

> No appeal shall lie from the judgment of the court.

What kind of justice is this? Surely it is not American justice, for the humblest of our citizens has the right of appeal.

This measure requires many changes before it is satisfactory. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I yield to no Member of this House in my devotion to uphold and maintain an independent Federal judiciary or in my devotion to the Constitution of the United States. On the 17th day of May of this year I made a speech on the floor of this House in which I expressed as forcefully as I could my opposition to the President's so-called court-reform bill, and I shall continue to oppose that measure with vigor, because in my opinion it will break down the independence of the Federal judiciary and make this coordinate branch of our Government subservient to the Executive. I also stated in that speech:

> The very life of a democracy depends upon an able, fearless, honest, impartial, and independent judiciary.

It is my opinion that the measure before us would have a tendency to make the judiciary more independent and at the same time provide a means to remove from the district bench any dishonest or unworthy member. This measure is not a part of and has no connection whatever with the President's so-called court reform bill. If I had the impression that this measure would in the least lessen the independence of the judiciary, I should be opposing and not supporting it. Knowing our distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Judge SUMNERS, as I do, I am thoroughly convinced that he is an able and honest advocate of an independent judiciary and of the Constitution. I may be wrong, but it is my opinion that there is no Member of the House or Senate, Republican or Democrat, who is more sincerely in favor of an independent judiciary and in upholding the Constitution than Judge SUMNERS.

I am unable to understand the alarm that is expressed by some Members on each side of the Chamber. For instance, my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] says:

> Suppose that three judges should try a judge under this bill, and suppose that at the same time the United States Senate would try him on impeachment charges.

That could not happen because this three-judge court, under the terms of this bill, could not try any judge unless and until the House of Representatives by a resolution authorized such action. The Senate could not try anyone on impeachment charges unless and until the House of Representatives had voted a bill of impeachment. We cannot conceive of the House passing a resolution authorizing the three-judge court to try a judge, as provided under this bill, and at the same time voting impeachment proceedings and have the judge tried before the Senate. The House of Representatives would not do such an inconsistent and foolish thing. Our friend from Wisconsin also insists that accused judges should have a trial by a jury, as a bootlegger has. The proceeding set up in this bill is not a criminal proceeding. It is a civil action instituted to determine whether or not the judge has been guilty of bad behavior. Our friend argues at the same time for impeachment of judges before the Senate. The accused would not have a jury trial there. He also says he attended the impeachment trial before the Senate of District Judge Ritter, and that many of the Senators absented themselves from the Chamber during the trial and did not hear the testimony and see the conduct of the witnesses.

He asserts that Judge Ritter did not and could not have a fair trial under such circumstances. I cannot understand why any Federal judge would not prefer to be tried by a court of his peers—three Federal judges—instead of being tried in such a haphazard way by the United States Senate. I should think that every Federal judge, if he were innocent, would welcome an opportunity to be tried by these circuit judges rather than by the Senate. He is bound to prefer such a trial unless he is guilty and feels that these judges would see his guilt and find him guilty. If he were an honest man and an innocent man why should he object to being tried by three experienced and capable judges? [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. But is that not the position of the judges? The judges are not objecting to this bill.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. My friend [Mr. MICHENER] has pointed out that he has been present and observed one or more impeachment trials before the United States Senate and many of the Senators were absent. They did not hear the witnesses testify and that under those circumstances the accused did not have a fair trial. My friend from Michigan says that this measure proposing a trial before three circuit court judges would break down the independence of the judiciary and would cause judges to fail in their duty for fear they might be tried before this tribunal of judges. Now he says that the judges themselves are not objecting to this bill. Why is my friend from Michigan objecting to it if the judges who may be tried before this tribunal are not objecting? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Some of us are devoted to the Constitution.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am just as devoted to the Constitution of my country as my friend from Michigan or any other man or woman of this House.

FEDERAL JUDGES HOLD DURING GOOD BEHAVIOR

Section 1, article III, of the Constitution provides:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The Constitution creates but one court, and that is the Supreme Court. It gives Congress the power to create inferior courts. Congress has created district, circuit, and other Federal courts, and does not this provision of the Constitution give Congress the power to set up the court provided in this bill to try district judges? We now have approximately 165 Federal district judges. Many people have been led to believe that a Federal judge is appointed for life. They are not appointed for life. They hold their offices "during good behavior." If they are of good behavior for life then they can hold their offices for life.

A Federal judge has tremendous power and exercises a very wide influence. In order that our judges might be free from the control or domination of the other two coordinate branches of our Government and might be free and independent to hear and determine all cases coming before them on their merits and give equal justice to all, the Constitution set them apart in a class by themselves. No change can be made in their salaries during their terms of office. They serve as long as they are of "good behavior."

As we have pointed out, the very life of our democracy depends upon an independent, honest, impartial, and courageous judiciary. The judges themselves should appreciate the honor they have been given and meet the conditions under which they were selected. It is of great moment to the future welfare of this Nation that the people have faith in our courts, and I deplore the attacks that have been made on our courts by the President and some other leading men of this country.

If the influence of our Federal judiciary is to be maintained and the people continue to respect our courts, the judges must by their good behavior justify the confidence and respect of the people. Is there a man or a woman in this House who favors continuing in office a Federal judge who is not of "good behavior?" It will hurt and not help our country to have judges free and independent who are not honest and not of "good behavior."

This bill proposes to set up a tribunal of three circuit court judges to try any judge charged with bad behavior. This court would hear the evidence, and if the court finds that the accused district judge has been of bad behavior, they find him guilty. If the judge is guilty of bad behavior, he certainly cannot complain, because he was appointed and accepted the high office under the conditions set out in the Constitution that he is to hold office "during good behavior."

How is one of these district judge brought to trial under this bill? It is not done in a careless or haphazard manner. In the first place, there must be a resolution introduced in the House charging the judge with bad behavior, and, of course, this resolution would set out in terms wherein the accused had been guilty of bad behavior. It might be treason, high crimes, misdemeanors, or other bad conduct unbecoming a Federal district judge. This resolution would then be referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House, made up of 25 members, Democrats and Republicans. The Judiciary Committee would hear witnesses and other testimony that it might desire, and that great committee would then report the resolution to the House with the recommendation that it pass or do not pass. The House, in its wisdom, would then take up the resolution, debate it, and vote on it. If the House favored the resolution, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court would select three United States circuit court judges to hear and determine the issue as to whether or not the accused judge was guilty. Under this bill the House would appoint managers or prosecutors to institute the proceedings in court and appear before this special court, and they would present the evidence and the law in support of the charges against the accused judge.

The Judiciary Committee and the House itself have over a period of 150 years exercised great care in the making of charges against Federal judges. I am advised that in 150 years impeachment charges have been voted by the House against only nine Federal judges. The introduction of the resolution in the House and its consideration by the Judiciary Committee and by the House of Representatives under this bill will require just as much formality and no doubt will be given just as careful consideration as an impeachment resolution. The accused will appear for trial before three trained and experienced circuit court judges. It will mean a real trial. The court will hear all the evidence and see the demeanor and conduct of the witnesses, and, of course, to convict will require the votes of two of the three judges. The accused judge is entitled to a fair and impartial trial.

The conviction of a Federal judge under this bill or by impeachment takes from him not only his high position but takes from him and his family something of much greater value if he is an honest man, and that is his good name. We cannot for a minute entertain the idea that these circuit judges who constitute this court, who themselves hold their offices during good behavior and who are free from political influence, would stultify themselves by convicting one of their innocent brother judges. The House of Representatives and the United States Senate are each the judges of the conduct of their own Members, and each one can expel its own Members who they think have been guilty of such conduct as does not entitle him or her to remain a Member of these respective bodies. The executive branch of the Government, without any interference from the Congress or the courts, may remove the appointees of the President and other executive officers.

The proceeding authorized by this bill gives the judiciary branch of the Government, after the House of Representatives has submitted the charges, the authority to clean its own house if it needs cleaning, and I am unable to understand why anyone would maintain that this measure, if adopted, would break down the independence of the judiciary. It seems to me that it would strengthen the judiciary in its own thinking and in the respect and confidence of the American people. No judge need have any fear except one who has broken the terms of his contract and has failed to be of good behavior.

There is no stronger defender of the Supreme Court and the Federal judiciary than I am. They are a splendid group of men. I have never known of any Federal district judge in my own State that has not been of good behavior. The Savior found one crook and traitor among the Twelve. Even in the ministry we find a few who are disloyal to their principles and to their church. And now and then a Federal judge falls by the wayside and brings the Federal judiciary into disrepute. The Federal judiciary must be kept clean, honest, impartial, and independent. If we permit a few dishonest, corrupt, or bad-behavior judges to remain in office it will break down the confidence of the American people in this great branch of our Government and result in irreparable damage to our Nation.

How long should a Federal judge who is not "of good behavior" continue to hold one of these high positions? He should not hold any longer than charges can be properly made and a fair trial had and ousted from his office. [Applause.]

IMPEACHMENT

Section 4, article II of the Constitution provides, "The President, vice president, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and for conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." It is urged that there is no other method of ousting a Federal judge than by impeachment. May I point out that it has been held time and again by the Supreme Court of the United States that the President and other officials of the executive branch of the Government may remove their appointees without impeachment. To impeach a judge a resolution of impeachment is introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and, after investigation, it reports the resolution back to the House for action. If a majority of the House votes favorably on the resolution the accused official is ordered before the United States Senate for trial, and it requires a two-thirds majority in the Senate to convict the accused. On conviction the Senate removes the accused from office and may disqualify the accused from holding any other office under the United States Government in the future. It will be observed that impeachment proceedings in the House are identical with the proceedings authorized under this bill, except under the impeachment proceedings the accused is tried before the United States Senate and under this bill he is tried before a court composed of three circuit judges.

The bill before us does not take away any of the power of the House to impeach any district judge. It merely gives the House additional right to proceed as set forth in this bill. No other civil officer of the Government is appointed with the conditions in his appointment such as there is for Federal judges.

The President, other executive and civil officers, members of the House and Senate are appointed or elected for a definite period of years, while judges of the Supreme Court or a judge of the lower Federal court is selected for a period of good behavior. We contend that when a judge ceases to be of good behavior his term of office may be brought to an end, and in the very nature of the case Congress has the right to set up a course of procedure to try out the issue of fact as to whether or not the judge has been or has not been of good behavior, and under this bill Congress merely sets up a three-judge court to try that issue, and if it is found that he has not been of good behavior this court may enter a judgment terminating the term of office of the accused judge, but this court cannot disqualify the accused judge for holding office in the future as in the case of impeachment before the Senate. There is nothing in this bill to prevent the House from using the impeachment procedure against a district judge if it desires to do so. Impeachment proceedings are cumbersome and unsatisfactory. There are 96 United States Senators. Every minute of their time is taken up with pressing legislative and other official business. In order to give the accused a real trial, the sort of trial that any accused person is entitled to, it would be necessary for these 96 Senators to lay aside practically all of their other duties and for 10 days or perhaps 2 weeks sit as a jury, hear testimony and arguments for and against the accused. In the impeachment trial of a district judge at times there were less than a dozen Senators present. Eighty or more were absent, yet at the conclusion of the trial the roll was called and all of these Senators were called upon to vote to convict or acquit the accused.

It is not my purpose to speak disparagingly of the Senate in handling an impeachment proceeding. Anyone who has been a Member of that body knows that it is humanly impossible to have all of the Senators present all of the time for a period of 10 days, 2 weeks or more, sitting as a jury. If they did, momentous and pressing interests of the Nation and their respective States and thousands of individuals would suffer. Yet the accused, as a matter of fairness, is entitled to have all of the Senators present to hear every witness and see the demeanor and conduct of each witness.

We now have approximately 165 Federal district judges. In the very nature of things there will be questions arising from time to time as to the conduct of some of these district judges. As a group, there has been no finer group occupying the bench in this country or in any other country, but some no doubt will fall by the wayside, and if this should occur, the bill before us provides a sane, sound, fair, and expeditious method by which the guilt or innocence of the accused may be established. The accused with his good name and all at stake is entitled to a fair and impartial trial by persons peculiarly fitted in training and experience to give him such a trial. I am giving this measure my support because I think it will be good for the bench, for the country, and for the accused. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the Members of this House want to do what is right about this thing. Some apprehension is expressed here that is remarkable. Members want to protect the judiciary, they say. They are afraid for judges to be tried by judges.

Now, let us look at this bill a minute. What do we do? We give to the judges of this country the best protection. Let us see if that is not so. We are going to either leave the Senate as the only tribunal or we are going to pass this bill. We protect those judges against disgruntled litigants. How? We leave the power to protect them in this House. Is that not right? All the testimony here is that this House has sent very few cases to the Senate. The House of Representatives stands between the judiciary and the opportunity of anybody to harass them or destroy their independence of judicial action. We leave that arrangement undisturbed; that remains. Then we give them another protection under this bill. We undertake by a better method than impeachment to protect the honest judiciary of this country against being smeared up by a little handful of crooks that ought to be off the bench. Is that not right? [Applause.] Then what else do we do by this bill? Do we send them to the Senate, where gentlemen who criticize this bill say they cannot get a fair trial? No; we send them to a court of three judges. What is the objection to that? We provide the House an opportunity to choose between that court and the Senate, which you criticize. True, they are prosecuted by the Attorney General. The Attorney General represents the United States in all suits of the United States.

This is to be a suit by the United States against a judge for violating the conditions of his contract. Is the judge helpless? The judge can be represented before three other judges, by the best lawyer he can employ. It is difficult to understand some of the attitudes today with regard to what is here proposed. There is a man over there who has as sound judgment as anybody I have ever seen, and I believe, if it were not for this present controversy about the Supreme Court, he would not have any question about this bill. He will not have it by tomorrow morning, because he thinks, and he thinks fast. [Laughter and applause.]

Now we have done a good job. I do not take credit for this. By the way, I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] I take back everything I said about these constitutional lawyers, but I will tell you the truth; I do not know a single man who can rank as an authority on constitutional law, who has examined this question, who does not believe this to be a justiciable issue that can be tried in a court. There may be, but I have not found them. I had this matter examined, after I had arrived at a tentative conclusion, by the legislative reference bureau, and they gave the opinion that under English procedure there were four methods of removal, and one of the methods was to proceed by scire facias. Try it in a court as we propose. There was no greater authority in the world on English constitutional law than Mr. Coke, and he wrote that judges were removable by scire facias. There is not any question about it. Todd in his Parliamentary Government in England, at page 192, says:

> When the office is granted for life * * * the forfeiture must be enforced by scire facias whether judicial or ministerial offices.

Now, what are we going to do about it? It is constitutional. These words "during good behavior" mean something. I want to protect the courts. I realize that our system of government, like our bodies, must have these three vital organs through which to function. We must have an independent judiciary. We must have a responsible legislature; responsible to the people; we must have an executive branch of the Government, but I know in my study of government that the way to protect government is to keep it clean. [Applause.]

There is too much tendency in a popular government, when power is being abused, to take the power from the office.

When the time comes in some great crisis when a strong government is necessary we find that the government has been so weakened by this process that it cannot meet the crisis and the people in disgust turn from a weak government to a dictator. Instead of taking power from the office, what we should do is to take from the office the man who abuses power. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. If we have this bunch of crooks on the bench today about whom the gentleman is talking we have the power to impeach them now and have the law on them. Why does not the gentleman bring in some resolutions against these men he thinks should be removed?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We are talking about the system now, and about the law we are trying to pass now. The gentleman is fixing to vote against it. He wants to continue to send the House in its charge against judges over to the Senate which he knows cannot afford to take the time of the Nation properly to try the case. I say that to my distinguished friend. Why, if Dickens were to look in on that situation and see a whole Senate turn aside from its duties in order to determine a case that ought to be determined by a court, he would make us ridiculous through all history—the idea, serious men and women like you hesitating in decision between an opportunity to try a justiciable issue in a court where it ought to be tried or sending it over yonder and making the Senate turn aside from the Nation's business and sit there hearing a case that should be tried in the courts. You know they will not do it. I do not blame the Senate for not wanting to turn aside from the big questions before them to try an issue that in all common sense ought to be tried in a court. That is where it ought to be tried, before a court, not before a legislative body, a political body, talking about politics.

I have heard many things said about the court since this controversy but I never heard it said until today, never even heard it intimated by anybody that three judges of the circuit court of appeals trying a district judge might stultify themselves in order to convict an honest man and remove him from office. [Applause.] I have heard a good many things, but I never heard that until today. If I believed that, I would not for a minute believe our courts could live. No, sir; it is not true, it is not true. I do not believe that the Chief Justice of the Nation would pick three men who would go on the bench trying a Federal judge, a brother judge, and because they were appointed by a President stultify themselves and bring in a judgment of guilt against an innocent man. Why do men talk that way now? What do we mean now?

Here is the horse-sense thing to do, and that is all this committee has tried to do. We have set up a tribunal to try an issue that ought to be tried in a court. That is not all; we have left the House of Representatives standing between the judges and any disgruntled litigants who might want to put them on trial. No judge will have to face that court of three men until the Committee on the Judiciary shall have investigated under the commission of the House and said that he ought to be tried. That is not all; no judge will face trial before that tribunal until this House, after consideration of the facts, shall have sent its request to the Chief Justice of the United States to assemble the tribunal. If you believe that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court would assemble a tribunal that would not give any man a fair trial, if you do, then you ought to join with those who would strike it down and remove it from the whole structure of our Government. That is the most remarkable argument I have heard against this bill; the most remarkable argument I have heard in this House since I have been a Member of the Congress.

What do you mean? What are you driving at? Where do you want a justiciable issue tried? We have got to choose between two methods. The Committee on the Judiciary has done its part. I appreciate the generous words of my friend, HOBBS. I do not deserve them. I, having pioneered in this thing, I have worked it out as best I could in the bill that we have brought in here. It is based on 20 years of actual contact with the problems that are involved.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not the gentleman's opinion and conviction that these judges against whom charges will be preferred, will obtain a fairer trial and more just treatment than they themselves have accorded in many instances to unfortunate litigants who have appeared before them?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; my friend from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] made one of the best statements in a short length of time ever made on the floor of the House. He pointed out that it is not a fair trial that these judges get now. We want them to have a fair trial. How are they going to have it? Where do you want them to have it? Where do people go for fair trials? They go to the courts of the country. Let it be in the courts of the country. That is what we propose to give to these judges by this bill. We want them to be independent of any politics, of anybody. We want them to be independent of the crooks in office.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. MASSINGALE. What does the gentleman think of the direction of the judgment in this case? It says here he shall be simply removable.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. MASSINGALE. When we take into consideration the Constitution which prescribes the terms and form of the judgment in impeachment cases.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It has nothing to do with impeachment. That is the constant confusion in our minds.

Mr. MASSINGALE. The question I wanted the gentleman to answer, if he would, is this, if I am not bothering him.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; if the gentleman will be quick. I have just a few minutes left.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Impeachment provides for removal from office and this just simply says "if removed."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Can the two coexist?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. They can coexist for the same reason in your State you can impeach an officer who steals public money and you can bring him into court in an ouster suit and put him out of office.

Mr. MASSINGALE. If I thought the gentleman was absolutely right, without doubt, I would go along with him.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Take it on faith and leave out the doubt.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLARD. I appreciate the ability of the gentleman.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am all right. Proceed a little faster.

Mr. MILLARD. Does not the gentleman see danger in turning over to a partisan Attorney General the prosecution of a judge?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman does not see any danger in that?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Of course, this is not perfect.

Mr. MILLARD. The Attorney General is partisan.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; the gentleman and I are partisan. We are both partisan, but we legislate for the Nation.

Mr. MILLARD. I am talking about the Attorney General. The gentleman does not see any danger in that?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No. It could hurt, of course. But the Attorney General is the law officer of the Nation; you cannot get away from that, and he represents the United States in all prosecutions. This is a national prosecution. It gives the judge the protection of being tried by three judges. This judge has the right to have as good a lawyer to represent him as the Attorney General and, remember, the Attorney General cannot initiate this suit. He prosecutes all other suits for the Government. The Judge being charged, is represented by his own counsel.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever a resolution of the House of Representatives is directed to the Chief Justice of the United States which states that in the opinion of the House there is reasonable ground for believing that the behavior of a judge of any court specified in section 4 has been other than good behavior within the meaning of that term as used in section 1 of article III of the Constitution, the Chief Justice shall convene, at a place and time designated by him, a court consisting of any three judges of the circuit courts of appeal designated by him. Such court shall have jurisdiction to determine the right of such judge to remain in office.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Strike out section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That whenever a resolution of the House of Representatives is directed to the Chief Justice of the United States, stating that in the opinion of the House there is reasonable ground for believing that the behavior of a judge to whom this act applies, as provided in section 6, has been other than good behavior within the meaning of that term as used in section 1 of article III of the Constitution, the Chief Justice shall convene, or cause to be convened, the circuit court of appeals of the circuit in which the judicial district of the judge is situated in special term for the trial of the issue of good behavior of such judge. The Chief Justice shall designate three judges of the circuit courts of appeal (one of whom he shall designate as presiding judge and any one or more of whom may be judges of the circuit court of appeals of circuits other than the one convened in special term) to serve on such court. Such court shall have jurisdiction to determine the right of such judge to remain in office.

"SEC. 2. All of the facilities, services, and equipment of the United States in the circuit in which any such court may sit which may be appropriate and useful for the purpose of such court are hereby made available for its use, and every officer of the United States is hereby required to cooperate with each such court and its several members and to make available all necessary courtroom and office facilities, stenographic and other services; and the clerk and marshals of the circuit court of appeals in any circuit in which any such court may sit are each hereby required to serve such court in the same manner, and as fully as they are, respectively, required to serve the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of that circuit.

"SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the Attorney General, by himself or by counsel designated by him, to institute on behalf of the United States, and to represent the United States in, a civil action in such court to determine the right of such judge to remain in office. In any such action the United States shall be a party to such controversy and shall have all the rights and duties of a plaintiff in a civil action in the Federal courts, and the judge shall have all the rights and duties of a defendant in such an action. All matters of procedure in any such action shall be governed by rules prescribed by the Supreme Court, but the trial shall be without a jury.

"SEC. 4. If the court determines that the behavior of the judge has been other than good behavior within the meaning of that term as used in section 1 of article III of the Constitution, the judgment of the court shall be that the judge is thereupon removed from office, but no other penalty shall be imposed by the court.

"SEC. 5. From the judgment of any such court, either the United States or the defendant may, within 30 days after its rendition, but not later, appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Notice in writing of the taking of such appeal must be filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court and also of the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, and a copy thereof must be served on opposing counsel. Such appeals shall be subject to and governed by the rules of practice and procedure now regulating appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, or such rules as may hereafter be adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States. The judgment appealed from shall remain in full force and effect and shall be final and binding unless or until it be reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon appeal. If the judgment appealed from be that of removal from office, the appellant shall forthwith cease to have any power, authority, or right to act as judge, but his salary shall be paid him until the determination of such appeal.

"SEC. 6. This act shall apply to all judges of courts of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories and possessions who hold their offices during good behavior, except the judges of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, the judges of the circuit courts of appeals, and the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. CELLER (interrupting reading of amendment). Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry, or shall I wait until the Clerk concludes the reading of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest the gentleman wait until the reading of the amendment is completed.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH (interrupting reading of amendment). Mr. Chairman, a point of order. This is an amendment to the second section.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, an amendment should be offered to only one section at a time. The gentleman offered an amendment at the end of section 1. If he is going to offer these other amendments, and it is in the shape of a single amendment, then we will accept that if he will give notice that he will offer amendments striking out the other sections as we reach them.

Mr. MILLER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have the opportunity to make that announcement at the conclusion of the reading of the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it necessary for the Clerk to read amendments which the gentleman intends to offer to section 2 at this time? We have not reached section 2.

Mr. MILLER. I am offering this as a substitute for the entire bill now pending before the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The entire bill?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. It is a substitute for the bill.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. Can an amendment in the form of a substitute amendment for the entire bill be offered without striking out all after the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. You can strike out the first section and insert a substitute for the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. After the first section is read, do I understand the ruling of the Chair is that the rest of the bill may be read where an amendment to one section has been offered? If that is the ruling, it is something new.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is offering an amendment striking out section 1 of the bill and inserting in lieu thereof a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. MICHENER. If it is a substitute, that is something else. The gentleman did not so state. Of course, the only difference is with respect to the time for debate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When the Clerk finishes reading the amendment as offered, what is the question then before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment which is now offered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question will be on the substitute?

Mr. MILLER. On the substitute; yes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. Suppose some Member wishes to offer an amendment to the substitute, in what form shall he have the right to offer such an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He may offer it as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. CELLER. Then it will be an amendment in the second degree in every case.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Under the ruling of the Chair, when may amendments to the substitute amendment be offered? Will the bill then be read by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments to the substitute may be offered while it is pending. The Chair may say that it is in order to perfect the substitute by amendment before the question is put on agreeing to the substitute.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] is not germane to section 1 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is offered as a substitute for the bill and is obviously germane to the pending bill. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in accordance with the action of the committee. The committee first reported the bill H. R. 2271, which you all have. Later it became necessary, in the judgment of the committee, that the original bill (H. R. 2271) be amended. On June 17 the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], had printed in the RECORD at page 7740 the proposed bill as it would appear with various amendments which the committee had adopted.

In order that the matter may be presented logically this amendment is offered as a substitute for the bill H. R. 2271 by offering an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and substituting the amendment of the committee. If the substitute is adopted, I then propose, when sections 2, 3, and 4 of the original bill are reached, to move to strike such sections from the bill, so the bill then before the House will be the one which has been passed upon by the committee and recommended by the committee, and which appears in the RECORD at pages 7740 and 7741.

This is the bill which has been discussed in the debate this afternoon. Section 1 of the bill is the section in which we set up the court composed of circuit judges. The next section provides the machinery for the trial. The third section designates the Attorney General the prosecuting officer. Then further provision is made for appeal, and so forth. In other words, the bill which has been discussed and argued before the Committee of the Whole House this afternoon is the one which I am offering now on behalf of the committee as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman state wherein any constitutional objection to the original bill, which everybody was urged in the debate awhile ago, is corrected by this amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I am not undertaking to say. However, I do say that this is the bill which was discussed by the proponents this afternoon. The one I have offered as a substitute is the one which was discussed.

Mr. MICHENER. This is a better bill than the one which everybody thought they were discussing this afternoon.

Mr. MILLER. I did not think anybody was mistaken about what was being discussed this afternoon.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. I may say I have heard a number of Members around here who have said they did not know anything about it, and I confess I did not know anything about it.

Mr. MILLER. I am sure the gentleman from Wisconsin knew about it, because a man who is as studious as the gentleman in reading the RECORD would have known of the amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentleman, but I assure the gentleman that studious as I may be, I am not a mind reader. I have been on the floor all the afternoon with the exception of about 15 minutes and nothing was said about any other bill during the afternoon. I am advised by other gentlemen who have been here all the time that until this minute nothing has been stated on the floor about any other bill except the bill which has been the subject of debate today. I assume all Members thought that bill was the only one to be considered today.

Mr. MILLER. I am sure the gentleman knew or should have known by the exercise of the ordinary diligence and great intelligence he usually exercises that the original bill would be amended.

Mr. BOILEAU. What gentleman on the floor, Member of the committee or anybody else, referred to this bill in the debate?

Mr. MILLER. The provisions of the amendment which I am offering were discussed generally. I defy the gentleman to apply the arguments which were made here to any bill other than the one which has just been offered.

Mr. BOILEAU. I submit to the gentleman that all the argument which was made this afternoon can apply very well to the bill H. R. 2271, which all of us had in our hands this afternoon.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. The gentleman stated that he knew no one who was more or less expert on the Constitution who would say this bill was unconstitutional.

I took the trouble to go to the United States Law Review to obtain an expression of opinion from judges and lawyers all over the country. The editor of the United States Law Review, without taking sides, published some questions which I pointedly asked with reference to the bill. I have received over 150 replies from judges, students, professors of law at various colleges, and others throughout the country, conversant with constitutional law, and the preponderant majority of my replies have been to the effect that the bill is unconstitutional. Even most of the judges down in Texas who have replied to me, say in so many words that in their opinion there is no warrant in the Constitution for this provision.

If there is no objection, I should like to insert in the RECORD the letters and communications which I have received from these students and experts throughout the country, indicating that the bill is unconstitutional.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], my very dear friend who sits next to me, has issued a challenge to me, and has asked me to show by reference to the Constitution or by reference to the debates in the Constitutional Convention, that there was any argument or any basis for this additional method of removal. I refer the gentleman to the debate in the Constitutional Convention held as of Monday, August 27, 1787, which clearly indicates, to my mind, that the framers of the Constitution intended only one method of ouster of judges, namely, impeachment; I shall read briefly from the debates in the Constitutional Convention of that day, when they considered the matter of the judiciary and the ouster or removal of judges:

Dickinson of Delaware, seconded by Gerry and Sherman—all adherents of State sovereignty—now moved that the judges "may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and House of Representatives."

In other words, an additional remedy was offered.

G. Morris objected that "it was fundamentally wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority." Rutledge said that "if the Supreme Court is to judge between the United States and particular States, this alone is an insuperable objection." Wilson observed that "the judges would be in a bad situation if made to depend on every gust of faction which might prevail in two branches of our Government." Randolph said that it would weaken the independence of the judges. The motion was rejected, Connecticut alone supporting it.

If our good friend will read further, he will find that similar motions involving different or other methods of ouster or removal of judges were also considered and rejected. So the conclusion is inescapable. The distinguished chairman of our committee stated at the inception of his remarks that at the time of the framing of the Constitution there were four well-known methods of ouster. Inasmuch as the framers of the Constitution selected one method of impeachment, by inference, beyond any question of doubt, all other methods were rejected by the framers; but even beyond that the debates indicate that all the other methods were debated and considered and every one of them was rejected.

So I believe I may say I have met the challenge of my good friend from Alabama.

The letters referred to by Mr. CELLER are as follows:

UNITED STATES COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK,
Brooklyn, N. Y., June 21, 1937.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Thank you for sending me copy of your minority report in connection with H. R. 2271.

I trust that it will not be considered indelicate for me to observe that the document seems to present unanswerable arguments. If it is desired to facilitate or accelerate the removal of district judges from office, the right way to do it is through an amendment to the Constitution.

With every respect, I beg to remain,
Faithfully yours,

MORTIMER W. BYERS.

SUPREME COURT,
Jackson, Miss., June 7, 1937.

Hon. NELSON W. WARNER,
United States Law, 253 Broadway, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of May 29, with reference to the bill introduced by Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, providing for the trial of certain Federal judges upon the issue of good behavior, I desire to say that in my opinion the bill would be unconstitutional. Section 4 of article II provides that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers shall be removed from office upon impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors." Article I of the Constitution provides that the Senate shall be the sole power to try all impeachments, etc.; and it also provides that the House of Representatives shall choose its Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power to impeach. Section 1 of article III of the Constitution provides, "The judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services compensation which shall not be diminished during their term of office."

These sections are to be construed together, and the words "during good behavior", in my judgment, mean so long as they have not committed an offense named in section 4 of article 2, quoted above. It will be noted from this section that the offenses for which a judge may be removed from office are treason, bribery, "or other high crimes and misdemeanors." The words "high crimes and misdemeanors" are not perfectly defined, and it is possible that Congress might specify what crimes other than treason and bribery would constitute impeachable offenses. The power to try judges, or remove them from office, would clearly be limited to impeachable offenses, under the general doctrine that where a constitution names certain things as constituting offenses, and gives specific powers with reference to certain subject matter, it is intended to be exclusive. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, eighth edition, page 139, quotes this rule as follows:

"Another rule of construction is that when the constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition, or to extend the penalty to other cases."

The Supreme Court of Mississippi, in State v. J. J. Henry (57 Miss. Repts. 125, 40 Southern Reporter 152), under clause (d) of the first syllabus, says "Where the constitution enumerates power granted or denied, it must be held to have named all of the powers so dealt with and as being, with the necessary implications, the sole limit of authority or restriction."

To the same effect is the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts (12 Peters, U. S. Repts. 657, 9 L. Ed. 1233) and Myers v. U. S. (272 U. S. 52, 71 L. Ed. 160).

In my opinion it was clearly contemplated that impeachment would be the only method of removing judges from office. Of course, judges would be subject to the criminal law and punishable for other offenses than those named, as any other citizen; but it would not be permissible for the House of Representatives to institute proceedings from the concurrent resolution, or by action of the House alone, because amendment no. 5 to the Federal Constitution would require the action to be instituted by indictment if there was to be a trial for crime.

The comment of Mr. CELLER, your Congressman, that the bill "does not define or explain 'good behavior'" is well taken, as due process of law would require the acts constituting good behavior to be defined with reasonable certainty before rights could be forfeited.

The Constitution of the United States created a government of separate departments, and the giving to one department power over another would clearly be confined to the grant in the Constitution itself, and could not be extended by the Congress to include other powers or subjects.

In an article in volume 8 of the Mississippi Law Journal (February 1936), at page 283, I have dealt at considerable length with the subject of impeachment, and that article may be considered in connection with this letter upon the subject. I have no objection to the publication of this letter, or to any use that may be made of it in discussions in the Congress upon the Sumners bill. It will be seen from the article on impeachment that it is my view that an impeachment is a judicial trial, and that the charges of offenses committed, which are relied upon to constitute misbrhavior, must be high crimes and misdemeanors, as distinguished from petty crimes and misdemeanors, and that the offenses must be defined by the law. It was never intended to give any officers or persons arbitrary powers.

Yours very truly,

GEO. H. ETHRIDGE.

MY DEAR MR. WARNER: I have your letter of May 29 enclosing copy of Sumners' bill and Congressman CELLER's letter.

I feel a great hesitancy in commenting upon the bill, because of my official position. So far as my personal feelings are concerned, I would have no objection whatever to the legislation. It occurs to me, however, that there would be a serious question as to constitutionality. I have not gone into that feature.

Yours very truly,

WATKINS, GRANT & WATKINS,

Mr. NELSON W. WARNER,
United States Law Review,
253 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 29 in which you ask a discussion of a bill proposed by Congressman EMANUEL CELLER. Knowing Chairman SUMNERS and Congressman CELLER as I do, I feel some diffidence in expressing an opinion about a bill prepared by them.

It does not seem to me that the proposed bill sent out with your letter could be held constitutional.

In article I of the Constitution, sections 6 and 7, there is conferred judicial power to try impeachment cases and a limit is fixed as to the judgment in such cases. It seems to me this is an exclusive remedy. In article II, section 4, "civil officers" are included in those officers removable by impeachment. This would seem to include judicial officers.

In article III, section 1, good behavior is prescribed as a requirement. It seems to me probable that good behavior, being so indefinite, furnishes another evidence of the exclusive power of the Senate.

There is another question suggested by section 2 of article III, Is an impeachment trial a case "in law and equity"? I am aware of the fact that a quo warranto was at common law a case at law but that writ ran to title and not to the political question. If this is a political question, of what constitutes good behavior.

Briefly, these are my reasons for believing that the proposed statute would be unconstitutional. I can see reasons why it would be an advisable statute if it could be constitutionally passed. You have leave to print this if you desire.

Yours truly,

EDGAR WATKINS.

UNITED STATES LAW REVIEW,
253 Broadway, New York City, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: I have your circular letter of May 29, together with clipping from your issue of June 1937, and I have carefully read and considered the letter of Representative EMANUEL CELLER, as well as the copy of bill recently introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House.

In the language of the wild and woolly West, it occurs to me that this is simply an effort on the part of Congress to pass the buck. In the first place, I have a very serious doubt as to the constitutionality of this bill. It might be well characterized as an effort to circumvent the Constitution, of which we have had overmuch in recent days.

I know of no legislation more important than that of impeaching an unworthy official, high or low, and certainly Congress should not shirk from this plain, constitutional duty. The argument that it does not have time will not appeal to the average American. I have a half-grown suspicion that it would be quite difficult to find a Representative or Senator who does not waste enough time during his term of office to try all impeachments from now to kingdom come. My attitude toward this and kindred legislation can be summed up in four words, "I am agin it." Why turn over such highly important procedure to three judges of the circuit courts of appeal or to any number of judges, for that matter, when the New Deal would seem to question the competency and honesty of the judiciary as a whole? Let the matter rest and remain where the framers of the Constitution saw fit to place it. In the light of recent legislation I have become quite fearful lest the multiplication table, or the Ten Commandments, be either repealed or amended.

Leave is hereby granted to print this letter, or any part thereof, together with the name of the writer.

Yours truly,

H. H. TYE.

GENTLEMEN: I have yours regarding the bill providing for ouster proceedings against United States district judges for misbehavior.

In my judgment there is doubt as to the constitutionality of the bill. Laying that to one side, the measure seems inequitable and unnecessary. It will tend to impair the independence of the judiciary. It does not prescribe a guide for use by the judges who will be called to determine the right of one against whom charges have been preferred to remain in office.

Should use be made of this letter I prefer that it be done without my name.

Very truly yours,

CLYDE L. YOUNG.

BOSTON, June 7, 1937.

Mr. NELSON W. WARNER,
United States Law Review:

Replying to your letter of May 29, 1937, addressed "to a limited number of members of the bar", asking for an expression of opinion relative to the subject matter of Congressman CELLER's letter with reference to "a bill to provide for trials of and judgment upon the issue of good behavior in the case of certain Federal judges", I am perfectly willing to express my opinion thereon.

As I view the question, the queries of Mr. CELLER, other than the first referring to the constitutionality of the proposed bill, are immaterial for I believe that the method proposed is outside of constitutional authority and that the proposed legislation cannot be considered without relation to the provision of the Constitution referring to impeachment.

It seems to me clear that article I, section 3, "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments", was intended to, and does, cover the entire field. It was intended to place the judges in a situation where they might act with freedom and fearlessness, subject only to removal by the Senate. The present comprehensive constitutional provision does not permit the removal of a judge by the method proposed by merely changing the name of the impeachment and the tribunal.

In my opinion such new authority might well impair the independence of the judiciary, particularly under the circumstances so well stated in Mr. CELLER's letter.

So far as I am informed, no such condition of affairs exists with reference to the judges of the District Court of the United States as to make such legislation necessary.

I do not agree with the theory that "there is a sort of legal contract between the Government and a judge." A judgeship creates a status which can be changed solely by the method provided in the Constitution, that is by the Senate upon impeachment.

It does not seem to me a reason for such legislation that in trials for impeachment the Members of the Senate do not perform their full duty. The Constitution evidently assumes the Senators would act conscientiously and in accordance with their duty in such proceedings. If they do not carry out this expectation, some method should be devised to secure the proper performance of such duty. This seems to be another case of an attempt to short-circuit constitutional requirements, of which there have been other examples within recent times.

JAMES M. SWIFT.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
Dallas, Tex., June 8, 1937.

UNITED STATES LAW REVIEW,
253 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: Being on the bench, I have hesitated to respond to your request of May 29.

I have concluded, however, that a judge is still a citizen and may appropriately speak upon such critical legislation as may be directed at the fundamental law of the land—provided, of course, he does so in a proper, dignified, and nonpolitical attitude.

The United States Constitution fixes the method for amendment. Time and again the people have exercised their rights thereunder.

That instrument having fixed the method of impeaching and depriving national judges of office may not be superseded by any congressional act which would shorten the life tenure in some unauthorized, unconstitutional manner.

The most serious malady of 1937 is the tinkering with the Constitution by legislation rather than by the vote of the people—the real masters in this Government.

A constitutional amendment which defines "good behavior" or which fixes other methods of trial than in the Senate, would place the matter squarely before the people.

The question is not exactly like the perpetual inquiry made by the expedientists who sporadically attack the constitutional requirements as to indictment, but it grows out of impatience with fixed methods. Many would like to do away with the so-called cumbersome method of bringing the citizen to trial.

It is rarely wise to forget that truth is everlasting, and, that fundamentals are never unnecessary, though at times they may defeat us.

Sincerely,

WM. H. ATWELL.

CONNOR & CONNOR,
Wilson, N. C., June 5, 1937.

EDITORS OF UNITED STATES LAW REVIEW:

Your circular letter of May 29, signed by Mr. Warner, enclosing copy of letter from Representative CELLER and copy of bill introduced by Representative SUMNERS received.

For 150 years it has at least tacitly been understood that the removal of a judge from office shall be by impeachment.

A judge is a civil officer; the Senate is constituted a Court of Impeachment. If a district judge may be removed by an act of Congress, a circuit court of appeals judge may be removed; a member of the Supreme Court may be removed; in fact, any civil officer may be removed without a trial by jury and with no appeal.

If three justices of the circuit court of appeals may constitute the court, then any three citizens appointed by the President or by any other officer named by Congress, they likewise constitute the court.

The recited fact that the Senators do not properly discharge the functions of their office is no excuse for the creating of an extra constitutional court. The proper remedy is for the Senators to perform their duty.

H. G. CONNOR, Jr.

BALTIMORE, MD., June 8, 1937.

Personally, I can see constitutional authority existing nowhere to justify such legislation. While the existing method is burdensome and cumbersome, that fact gives no power to Congress to shift such trials from the Senate to the courts referred to. Many times the C. C. A. is no better than the lower courts. There is very little difference between the two types of judges. The responsibility should remain where it is now placed. If any change is to be made, a specially constituted court should be created, though I don't like that, either. A high type of court, of that kind, would, however, be less objectionable than any other.

GEO. WASHINGTON WILLIAMS.

RAPID CITY, S. DAK., June 9, 1937.

EMANUEL CELLER,
Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The United States Law Review sent me a copy of a letter written by you to the Review appending a copy of the bill introduced by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, chairman of that committee.

I have some doubt about the constitutionality of such an act, but I do not think myself competent to express an intelligent opinion as to its constitutionality. Assuming that such an act would be constitutional, I would prefer to have the fitness of judges to continue in office determined by such a court as is contemplated by the bill. This assumes that the judiciary is to continue to be independent.

Spokesmen for the administration now admit what was formerly evaded or denied; namely, that the executive branch of the Government is trying to control the judiciary. Until this matter is settled, it would be well to wait before such a bill as has been introduced is enacted.

In other words, even though the bill contemplates a trial before a court—which I prefer—it would be, in my opinion, better to wait until we find out whether the courts are to maintain their status as a coordinate instead of a subservient department of the National Government.

Yours very truly,

WALTER G. MISER.

This morning's mail brings a letter from the United States Law Review containing your own letter on Chairman SUMNERS' bill providing a new form of ouster proceeding against United States district judges for "misbehavior." Without being able now to take the time to study the question more closely, I had always supposed that the removal of a Federal judge could only take place by formal impeachment, and that inasmuch as the Senate has "the sole power to try all impeachments", this precluded assigning the function of trying "good behavior" to any other body. Offhand, therefore, I should have supposed that the attempt to assign this function to three judges of the circuit court of appeals would conflict with the provision that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. Impeachment, as I understand it, is a method of trial reserved for high officials of the Government. Lack of good behavior is a ground for instituting an impeachment by the House before the Senate. Chairman SUMNERS must, however, have some argument available to support his bill, and I should be glad of an opportunity to read that argument.

With kind regards, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

EDWIN M. BORCHARD,
Professor of Law, Yale University.

In re House bill—Judicial good behavior.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CELLER: I have read with a great deal of interest your letter to the United States Law Review and also the circular letter issued by it under date of the 29th ultimo.

I offer my comments in respect to the bill designed to supplant the present method of impeachment of Federal judges briefly and succinctly in this way:

Those responsible for the authorship of the bill are clearly ignoring the fundamental imports and connotation of the word "impeachment" as the same is used in article I, section 3, of the Federal Constitution. Those conceiving the bill assume that the word "impeachment" as in that section used and the term "good behavior" as used in article III, section 1, have no relationship to each other or the method of determining the grounds for impeachment and the method of ascertaining the existence of "good" or "bad" behavior are separable.

Essentially, of course, the word "impeachment" as used in the Constitution has the clear and distinct meaning of "official accusations." The term "high crimes and misdemeanors", in my judgment, also envisages every conceivable misconduct on the part of an encumbent of judicial office which would affect his capacity to discharge his duties as judge or seriously reflects upon the dignity of his office. The authors unquestionably assume that the term "misdemeanors" has the technical aspect of misconduct amounting to perpetration of an offense prohibited by law. The founders of the Constitution, I am certain, meant to give to the term the broader signification, to wit, any ill behavior or misconduct of sufficient gravity to indicate the unfitness of the encumbent to continue in office.

To summarize, unless, in my opinion, the Constitution be amended so as to permit the vestiture of a body other than the Senate to try out articles of impeachment (accusation), the proposed act would be clearly unconstitutional.

Very truly yours,

WALTER R. ARNOLD.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOILEAU moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I have taken this means of obtaining the floor because I want to talk as soon after the discussion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] as possible. The gentleman from Arkansas stated that one with my diligence should certainly have discovered the fact that the committee intended to offer this substitute amendment. I appreciate the fact that the gentleman's statement was made with some suggestion of good humor, but I call his attention to the fact that not one single member of the Committee on the Judiciary and not one single Member speaking on the floor this afternoon made any suggestion that a substitute amendment was going to be offered at this time. Only one statement was made by anybody about any proposed amendment, and that was a statement made by the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, when he said that at the proper time he was going to offer an amendment that would provide for an appeal, either on the part of the United States or on the part of the judge involved in the particular case.

This is the only suggestion of any amendment, and no one, including the gentleman from Arkansas, in the debate today referred to any committee amendment, other than the statement about appeals, and not a single Member of this House gave any intimation that we were going to have a substitute amendment offered at this time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. A comparison of the substitute offered by me with the original bill would reveal that the only material difference is the fact that we provide for an appeal by the judges in section 5 of the proposed substitute.

Mr. BOILEAU. I did not have opportunity to thoroughly analyze this bill that appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of some days ago, but section 2 is far different from section 2 of the bill before the House.

Mr. MILLER. There is some difference there.

Mr. BOILEAU. And I submit that there is a material difference between the two bills. The gentleman said that I should, by the exercise of due diligence, have discovered that we were talking about two different bills, and he said that all of the argument this afternoon was with reference to the bill that appears on page 5946 of the RECORD and not with reference to this bill before the House. I defy the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] or anyone else to refer to one single item on the floor this afternoon which does not apply to the bill before the House. It may be that the gentleman and others had the other bill in mind, but I submit to the gentleman that I read this bill before we considered it on the floor, and that all the argument presented this afternoon was applicable to this bill, H. R. 2271.

Mr. MILLER. H. R. 2271 does not provide for appeal.

Mr. BOILEAU. I made the statement about the amendment, which the gentleman said he was going to offer, providing for an appeal, but the other arguments apply to the bill H. R. 2271.

Mr. MILLER. There have been some arguments this afternoon based on the personnel of the court.

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. And the methods suggested and debated are in accordance with the substitute rather than with the original bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. Discussion with reference to the selection of judges provided that the Chief Justice of the United States should appoint three of the judges of the circuit courts of appeal, and that is practically all the discussion there was this afternoon with reference to that procedure, and that applies to the bill H. R. 2271.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. And the resolution and report both apply to H. R. 2271.

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes. I submit there are not 10 Members of this House, outside of the Committee on the Judiciary, who had any idea that this substitute amendment was to be introduced. I do not desire to make such a point as to that, but the gentleman from Arkansas indicated that I should have known. I submit that all of the other Members of the House had the same impression that I had, and none of us, except perhaps those on the Committee on the Judiciary, were informed that this amendment was to be offered in the form of a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. If there is practically no difference in these bills, what difference does it make whether we discuss this bill or the substitute?

Mr. BOILEAU. I submit my only purpose at the time I addressed my remarks to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] was to ask for information; and I submit to my friend from Arkansas—and I am glad to recognize him as a good friend of mine—in reply to my query, when I was looking for information, tried to give the impression that the Members of the House should realize what the members of the committee had in mind. For that reason I absolve myself of all blame, and I do not believe anyone can say that I have not made a reasonable effort to ascertain what was in the minds of the committee when this bill was under consideration.

Mr. SHORT. And there was not the slightest inkling during all of the debate about the substitute until the debate had entirely closed.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentleman for substantiating my remarks.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I hope the substitute will be adopted. There are some very important amendments.

Mr. BOILEAU. I have not been addressing my remarks with reference to the merits of the two proposals. I have not had a chance to read over the substitute. I do not know what it is. I know what this bill is, and I know that I would not vote for it. I do not know whether I would vote for the substitute or not. I hope the members will have ample opportunity to consider the bill we are about to consider.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I hope that this confusion may not disturb our vote on this very important matter. As a matter of fact, as has been stated, there is but one important change proposed. I admit that we have not been as careful as we ought to have been, in making reference to these amendments, but I shall make a statement as to what was done. The Committee on the Judiciary agreed to two amendments in all, the important one granting the right of appeal. That has been discussed. The one dealing with the construction of the court, as the gentleman will observe, has only to do with the question which might have arisen as to the constitutionality of the original arrangement, but the amendment with reference to the court leaves untouched the fact that the court is to be convened by the Chief Justice, and that he may bring in additional judges after the court has been convened.

There was some question as to whether or not the facility of the court would be available to this new court, and that was made clear by amendment. In addition to that explanation, in justice to the committee, I direct attention to the fact that anticipating the importance of this matter, I made a statement on June 17 calling the attention of the House to the fact that this identical amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER], would be offered. That amendment was printed in the RECORD for the information of the House. Due to the fact that that amendment had been printed in the RECORD with notice given from the floor of the House and there was not any important amendment offered except the one giving the right of appeal which has been discussed here today, the committee certainly did not realize it was unfair to the House. We are sorry Members feel we have been. When you examine the debate and read the proposed amendment that was printed in the RECORD for your information on the 17th you will see that the bill which you are going to be asked to pass upon is the bill that has been debated here today and which was printed in the RECORD several days since.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I wish to make it clear that I do not make any insinuation that the committee deliberately misled the House. I do say, however, that practically all Members with whom I have had an opportunity to discuss this matter did not happen to know about this particular amendment. I was one of those, and I think we should not be accused by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] or anybody else of not using due diligence.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will straighten him out. I will make him come over and apologize to the gentleman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOBBS. Did not the chairman state in presenting this amendment that this amendment was going to be considered?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. You will find that in the RECORD. The main thing is that this bill which you are going to be asked to vote on directly is the bill that was debated today.

Mr. TERRY. In section 2 of the original bill it says, "It shall be the duty of the Attorney General, by himself or by counsel designated by him", and this committee had also "or of such counsel as may be designated by the House of Representatives."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We did not feel justified in risking the proposition of the House designating somebody to institute and prosecute a suit in the name of the Federal Government.

Mr. TERRY. There has been some criticism of that sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time on this motion has expired.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the enacting clause.

The quesiton was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH to the committee amendment: Section 3, line 1, strike out the words "Attorney General" and insert in lieu thereof "managers designated by the House of Representatives."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have just offered is an attempt—perhaps a feeble one—to carry out my suggestion made in my remarks on this bill during general debate. It is impossible for any Member of the House to identify any amendment, because none of us has a copy of this substitute. The amendment cannot be designated by page or line. It is merely offered as an amendment to section 3. It was in the second section of the original bill. I understand it must be offered before the substitute is acted upon or it may not be offered at all.

Perhaps a great many Members who are now present heard my protest against the injection of the executive department into the trial of a judge. My protest was against that provision of the bill which has the effect of naming the Attorney General of the United States as the prosecuting officer to try this judge before this special court made up of circuit court judges. The gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has intimated in the remarks he made this afternoon that were it not for another court issue now pending—and I hope dead—it would not have occurred to me to have made this suggestion or this argument. As a matter of fact, I am thinking entirely upon the form of our Government. I do not care who is President or who is Attorney General when I give consideration to the machinery set up in this bill for the prosecution of a judge. I do not believe it is wise or safe with respect to the future independence of our judiciary to place in the hands of the President of the United States—and that is what you do when you name the Attorney General—the power to prosecute a judge before a court. In my judgment, if the House of Representatives is to initiate the proceedings that this resolution transmits to the Chief Justice of the United States to start this judicial process by which a judge is tried, the House of Representatives should stay in the picture until the case is closed.

Why should the House, which presents the charges, step aside and pass the "buck"? Why should it be handed to the Attorney General and have him marshal all the executive power—and no one can tell the character of the power that may be marshaled by the executive branch against the judge whose opinions may have been unpopular to the administration—why should the House subject a judge to that kind of treatment from another branch of the Government not affected? The House should pursue the charges with its own managers, just as it does under present procedure. When we bring impeachment proceedings against a judge and it goes to the Senate, the evidence is presented by the managers on the part of the House. That is the plea I make—that the managers on the part of the House, if there is to be a prosecution, do the prosecuting.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot see the potency of the argument of the gentleman from New York against the cause being tried by the Attorney General, who represents the United States Government. In the first place, if the House of Representatives should send managers, they would represent another department of the Government that would be trying the judiciary or prosecuting the cause. The gentleman assumes that the executive department would be less competent or more inclined to prejudice than the House of Representatives. I cannot see the potency of this argument. The Attorney General tries all cases in which the United States is a party, and certainly within this class of cases would fall a good-behavior case against one of the members of the judiciary after the indictment or charges have been filed by this House. Under the laws of Indiana an indictment for crime is brought by the grand jury summoned by the court, but they do not try the cause. The prosecuting attorney or the attorney for the Commonwealth tries the cause upon the indictment brought by the inquisitorial body, the grand jury.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. That is true, and that is the very objection here, that the Executive executes the laws, the courts determine the laws. The Attorney General would undoubtedly be a party when he appeared as a prosecutor.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand the question of the gentleman, and I do not agree with his position at all. The Attorney General up to this time has had nothing to do with this case. The evidence has been presented before the Judiciary Committee of this House. This committee has inquired into it and brings the charges for trial because of misbehavior. He has only one thing to do as the representative of the United States Government—that is, to try the issue on the charges that have been brought by this body and which will be substantiated by evidence introduced by him the same as in any other lawsuit.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. Under the provisions of this bill the House would prefer charges in a resolution sent to the Chief Justice. May not the Attorney General add charges of his own accord?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand that the issue will be joined upon the articles of indictment that are brought from this body.

Mr. TERRY. Is the Attorney General confined to the charges preferred by the House?

Mr. GREENWOOD. He is confined, under the rules of the court, to present his evidence in an orderly way, according to rules laid down by the court, the same as he would have to do in any other case that he were trying, and I think that that is quite proper.

All three departments of the Government are interested in the judiciary being kept clean and being kept on a high and dignified plane. One department brings the charges, this body. The Attorney General, who is not accountable to anybody except to perform his duty under his oath, in representing the United States Government is charged with presenting the case to a court that is summoned by the Chief Justice of the United States, a court of judges to try one of the members of their judiciary. What could be fairer? Would any judge object to his fellow judges on the bench trying his cause when they have been selected by the Chief Justice of the United States? It seems to me this would give him a fairer trial than he would receive through the political processes of impeachment to be tried by the Senate of the United States; and we must bear in mind the fact that the time of the Senate is needed for other purposes.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. Then it is my understanding that the gentleman believes that the Attorney General cannot add charges to those brought by the House.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I have no reason to believe, from a reading of the bill, that he could add to the charges.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to permit me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the substitute do close in 10 minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the only request I would make is that I be given the opportunity to perfect the amendment. As it was read to the House it was not complete. This indicates how difficult it is to draft amendments.

Mr. MILLER. Of course, the House will act on the amendment as it is finally reported by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, this substitute provides—

> That whenever a resolution of the House of Representatives is directed to the Chief Justice of the United States, stating that in the opinion of the House there is reasonable ground for believing that the behavior of a judge to whom this act applies, as provided in section 6, has been other than good behavior within the meaning of that term as used in section 1 of article III of the Constitution, the Chief Justice shall convene—

And so forth. This is the only resolution required to compel the Chief Justice to convene a court and notify the Attorney General. No indictment is drawn.

I presume the Attorney General will then start an investigation. The House does not have to give a single particular. All that is necessary is to allege that the House has reason to believe that the conduct of a certain United States judge is not good conduct, whereupon the Attorney General is turned loose with his Department to ferret out and find out, if he can, wherein the conduct is bad. An indictment is then drawn. There is no indictment provided for in this bill. Here we are writing a statute. We are abandoning the regular impeachment proceedings as heretofore known. All that is necessary is to comply with the statute. Its terms are clear and unmistakable. All that is necessary is a reasonable belief in the mind of Congress that something might be wrong with some judge's conduct. Mere rumor or the political influence of a disappointed litigant might put the judge on trial. I say it is perfectly ridiculous.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. Could not these charges grow out of the lower courts, where the Attorney General has prosecuted before this judge, and that same Attorney General go back before that judge in this proceeding?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. If you want to talk about possibilities, not probabilities, you might try the man under this procedure here, if it is constitutional, and if you do not like the result, you could then have some Member here impeach the judge, because you cannot get rid of the impeachment feature of the Constitution. You cannot eliminate impeachment proceedings against Federal judges, and you cannot impeach a Federal judge under the Constitution unless he is a civil officer. If after 150 years we discover that a Federal judge is not a civil officer, then we have wrongfully prosecuted judges in impeachment trials.

Mr. CHURCH. Then will not this amount to a club that can be used by an Attorney General of the United States to be held over every district judge in the United States if the lower House happens to vote in favor of proceeding against some judge, thereby enabling the Attorney General to go out to try that judge?

Mr. MICHENER. The same Attorney General would go out and investigate and would file an information embodying the charges. He would not be limited by anything other than the statutory resolution taking the case to the Chief Justice.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOBBS. I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, methinks I see in the distant future prosecutions inaugurated under the bill that we are going to pass this afternoon, and methinks I hear the distinguished gentleman from Michigan snorting in the same old rage against it, when we are drawing the bill of particulars in this House, as we will.

The gentleman knows when we talk about an indictment for murder, the indictment does not read "for murder." It reads that John Smith killed Pete Brown by shooting him with a pistol against the peace and dignity of the State. Yet we call it murder. The same thing applies here.

There is not a man, woman, or child with intelligence above the level of that of an imbecilic doodle who does not know what misbehavior on the part of a judge is. Yet we have no other idea than to set forth in detail, exactly wherein every accused judge has failed to maintain good behavior. We will be glad to give each one of them a bill of particulars.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. It is true under the law by which an indictment is drawn, the same law defines what is murder?

Mr. HOBBS. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. So that when the indictment states what John Doe did it definitely states he has committed murder and murder is then proven. But in this bill good behavior is not defined.

Mr. HOBBS. Nor is any other constitutional provision defined, but the courts have the power and capacity to define every one and can do so with no difficulty whatever in the instance of the good-behavior clause.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. No; I am sorry I cannot, because I want to pay my respects again to my good friend the senior member of this committee. In my former remarks I asked him if the framers meant that impeachment should be the sole mode of ouster, why did not they say so? He said they did. I demanded the proof. He has not produced it, and has shifted from his claim of support in the Constitution to his new position that the debates of the Convention justify his assertion. I accept the new challenge. The debates, according to Madison and his notes, give absolutely not one syllable to justify his comment that this bill is outlawed by the Constitution or any provision of it. Why, of course, the Constitutional Convention voted down the proposal to give the Executive the power to kick any judge out of office on the application by Congress. That was but a modification of the English mode of ouster by an "address to the Crown." Thank God, we then had and now have no Crown in the United States! The Supreme Court was rejected as a "high court of impeachment" because it was thought that in impeachment trials a member of the Supreme Court would frequently be the defendant. You will search in vain for a word against anything even resembling what this bill proposes. There is not an intimation or hint of opposition to any such suggestion.

The framers of the Constitution knew why that good-behavior clause was put in there. They wrote a contract with every judge that he should only hold office during good behavior. They knew that eventually we would need an enabling act to utilize the power implicit therein. We are supplying that need today.

May I assure my good friend from Michigan, and the other distinguished gentlemen who seem worried that a corrupt judge might not know about his own sin, that this House will always see to it that the accused is furnished with a full, clear, and specific bill of particulars.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I yield gladly to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. I am sure that we will, if it ever comes to that, but under this bill as drawn we are not required to do it. All you need to do is to pass a resolution that you believe a certain judge should be investigated and that is the purpose of sending this thing to the courts and have the Attorney General make an investigation.

Mr. HOBBS. I do not believe, and the gentleman does not believe, and nobody else believes, there will be any such foolish resolution ever passed by the House of Representatives as one reading that such-and-such a judge has been guilty of conduct which is not good behavior. We will say that he misbehaved in the following stated particulars. We will specify them, to the complete satisfaction of the accused judge and his counsel, then, what is more, we will prove those charges, and purge the bench of those few who still disgrace it by dishonesty and corruption. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with my understanding with the gentleman in charge of the bill, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in order to make it fit the text of the committee amendment and ask the Clerk to read the amendment as so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH to the committee amendment: Section 3, line 1, after the word "the", strike out "Attorney General by himself or by counsel designated by him" and insert in lieu thereof the following, "managers designated by the House of Representatives", so that the first sentence of section 3 will read, "It shall be the duty of the managers designated by the House of Representatives to institute on behalf of the United States, and to represent the United States in, a civil action in such court to determine the right of such judge to remain in office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, Mr. WADSWORTH, to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. MILLER.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WADSWORTH) there were—ayes 83, noes 45.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hancock of New York to the committee amendment:

On page 1, line 6, after the word "that", strike out "the behavior of", and after the figure "4", in line 7, strike out the balance of the line, all of line 8, and all of line 9, down to and including "Constitution" and insert in lieu thereof "has been guilty of acts of corruption, neglect of duty, or incompetence (which must be specifically set forth in said resolution)."

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, possibly this amendment is not offered at the appropriate place in the substitute amendment, but I do not know how to do so. We have no copy of the substitute before us. I would like to have it considered at the proper place in the substitute amendment.

The object of my proposed amendment is perfectly clear. It has been stated before by myself and a half dozen other speakers, and cannot be denied, that if this bill becomes law it will be possible for the House of Representatives to hale a judge before a court of three on the most trivial charges or on charges containing no specifications of misconduct. It would be sufficient to pass a resolution reading something like this—

Resolved, That a certain judge has been guilty of behavior other than good behavior, and be it further resolved that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court be directed to convene a court to try that issue.

There is a limitation, "good behavior within the meaning of section 1 of article III of the Constitution." But in that section there is no difinition of good behavior. There is no guidepost, there is no standard, there is no measuring stick whatever. Whatever the House designates as misbehavior becomes misbehavior, or it need not specify anything. In order to give the accused judge the same small safeguard enjoyed by the humblest defendant in a criminal case, my amendment proposes to let the judge know the specific charges against him. I define "misbehavior" as incompetence, neglect of duty, or corruption, and requires specifications. If there are other forms of judicial misconduct than these, I would be glad to include them, but it seems to me it is an utter absurdity to leave it open for a future Congress—I am not talking about this Congress—to persecute a good judge on a general charge of "behavior other than good behavior."

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] says he cannot conceive of any House of Representatives bringing in what is in the nature of an indictment against a Federal judge without a bill of particulars, without specifications. The gentleman is in favor, in each case, of giving the charge with great particularity. If so, why should he object to putting such language in the bill? I can conceive of a Congress which would be so political, so prejudiced, a Congress such as those we had after the Civil War, that it would deny to stout-hearted judges the rights of the lowliest criminal. If you believe judges should be entitled to know the charges against them, then vote for this amendment. The most contemptible crook has a right to know the accusation against him in every jurisdiction I ever heard of, except modern Russia.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a pretty serious matter. Good behavior is not defined in the Constitution. I would not be candid or honest with the House if I did not say this legislation in a sense is experimental. However, I believe enough in the institutions of this Government and the persons who are in charge of administering the affairs of this Government to believe that the things about which gentlemen are apprehensive will not develop. As a matter of fact, if we now have a House of Representatives and courts which will do the things these gentlemen seem apprehensive will be done, it is proof positive we have passed the time when we can operate a system of free representative government.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. As a matter of fact the only provision in the Constitution about impeachment is simply that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and under that provision of the Constitution there has never been an article of impeachment preferred which was not particularized, and that is what will necessarily follow here.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. If the gentleman will yield, this is not an impeachment proceeding; it is something entirely different.

Mr. MILLER. I know; but it is an ouster proceeding.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is provided in this bill that the whole proceeding shall be under rules promulgated by the Supreme Court. We cannot undertake to set out what constitutes bad behavior, because we cannot anticipate what a judge may do. The minute you enumerate what cannot be done, then you exclude all other bad behavior for which judges should be removed.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Can the gentleman think of any form of official misconduct other than corruption, neglect of duty, or incompetence, for which a judge should be removed? If so, I should be glad to include it in my amendment.
